And therefore the soules of Penelope's paramours conducted by Mercury chirped like bats, and those which followed Hercules made a noise, but like a flock of birds.
Brown. Urne Burial, c. 4.

The little bird, yet to salute the morn,
Upon the naked branches sets her foot,
The leaves then lying on the mossy root,
And there a silly chirruping doth keep,
As though she fain would sing, yet fain would weep.
Drayton. Q. Marg. to Duke of Suffolk.

Dumb o'er my pillow hung my watch unwound,
No ticking death-worm told a fancy'd doom,
Nor hidden cricket chirrup'd in the room.
Hughes. The Morning Apparition.

If chance at length he find a greensward smooth,
And faithful to the foot, his spirits rise,
He chirrups brisk his ear erecting steed,
And winds his way with pleasure and with ease.
Cowper. Task, b. iii.

But, with a chirrup clear and strong,
Dispersing all his dream,
I thence withdrew, and listen'd long
The windings of the stream.

CHESS, n. See CHECK. In some of our old authors written, Cheste.

The onely excuse of his foy is to say that he so much trusted fortune's flattering, that he thoughte neuer to see her chaunge, nor yet to haue at dice any euel chaunce, or at chester any checke mate.—Hall. Edw. IV. an. 9.

William the Conqueror in his younger yeares, playing at chesse with the prince of France (Dauphine was not annexed to that crown in those dayes) losing a mate, knocked the chesse-board about his pate, which was a cause afterward of much enmity betwixt them.
Burton. Anat. of Melancholy, p. 272.

This is the very assertion which Chrysippus holdeth: that wicked persons have no need, and yet are indigent, turbid, shifting, and transposing the common notions, like unto cockall bones or chesse-men upon the boord.
Holland. Plutarch, p. 893.

Thus a company of chess-men standing on the same squares of the chess-board, where we left them, we say they are all in the same place, or unmov'd; though perhaps the chess-board hath been in the mean time carry'd out of one room into another, because we compar'd them only to the parts of the chess-board, which kept the same distance one with another.—Locke. On Hum. Underst. b. ii. c. 13.

CHEST. Mr. Tyrwhitt interprets, Debate. In Cotgrave, Chestiveté: curstness, knavery, shrewdness, is from Chestif, or Chétif, i. e. Caitif, (qv.) and chest may have been adopted from Chestif. The editor of Piers Ploughman renders Cheste, chastening: it is more probably this word, denoting, generally—Mischief.

And mad tille him feaute, withouten any chest.
R. Brunne, p. 19.

What cheste and meschaunce, to children of Israel
Pul on hem that free were, throwe two false preestes.
Piers Ploughman, p. 6.

If it be a foure square temple, in the midst of the temple towards the north side thereof, they take in one chamber in that place where the quire should stand. And within the said chamber they place a chest long and broad like vnto a cable, and behinde the same chest towards the south, stands their principall idole.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 114.

The sum of their answer was, "that the boweling and cering was done in the best manner; the leading and chesting was preparing, not lacking any thing, and that it should be finished with all speed."
Strype. Memoirs. Hen. VIII. an. 1535.

Jefferey [Hudson] was born in the parish of Okenham, in this county, where his father was a very proper man, broad-shouldered and chested, though his sonne never arrived at a full ell in stature.—Fuller. Worthies. Rutlandshire.

There was found besides, a bigge chest full of diuers and sondry poisons, which, soon after being by Claudius drowned in the seas, infected and poisoned the same, not without the deadly bane of fishes killed therewith which the tide cast up to the next shores.—Holland. Suetonius, p. 146.

CHE'STNUT, n. } Fr. Chastaigne; It. Castagna; Sp. Castana; Lat. Castanea. It is, says Vossius, from Castana, or Castanea, a city of Thessaly, where there is great abundance of them; but Pliny says, "the first chestnuts were knowne to grow about Sardis, and from thence were brought, and therefore the Greekes call them Sardinian nuts," (l. xv. c. 23.) It is frequently, but not so properly, written Chesnut: in Golden Boke the tree is called Chestain.
CHE'STNUT, adj. }

Of the trouth the chestain tres bryng forth the soft swete chestnut out of the sharp prickyng and hard huske.
Golden Boke, c. 9.

As for the thrise three-angled beech nut shell,
Or chesnut's armed huske, and hid kernell,
No squire durst touch, the law would not afford,
Kept for the court, and for the king's own board.
Bp. Hall, b. iii. Sat. 1.

——— I mean the roan, Sir,
And the brown bay: but for the chesnut-colour'd,
Though he be full of metal hot, and fiery,
He treads weak in his pasterns.
Massinger. Great Duke of Florence, Act iii. sc. 1.

It is first green, but when ripe it turns yellow: then the Indians, (whose manufacture it is, and who sell it cheap to the Spaniards,) gather it, and lay it in the sun, which makes it soft; then it changes to a chesnut-colour.
Dampier. Voyage, vol. i. c. 8. an. 1685.

The cunning old pug, ev'ry body remembers,
That when he saw chesnuts a roasting i' th' embers,
To save his own bacon, took puss's two foots,

CHE'VRONED, adj. } Chèvre, capra.

A transverse beam or rafter of a house is so called from some likeness to a kid or goat; which I, says Skinner, am stupid enough not to understand.

Chevroned: transversed like beams or rafters.

The masquers were placed in a great concave shell, like mother of pearle, curiously made to move on those waters, and rise with the billow; the top thereof was stuck with a cheuron of lights, which, indented to the proportion of the shell, strook a glorious beame upon them, as they were seated, one before another.—B Jonson. Masque of Blackness.

Their labels were of white cloth of silver, laced, and wrought curiously between, suitable to the upper halfe of their sleeves; whose nether parts, with their bases, were of watchet cloth of silver, chev'ron'd all over with lace.

CHICA'NE, v. }
CHICA'NE, n. }
CHICA'NER. }
CHICA'NERY. }
CHICA'NING, n. }

Fr. Chicaner. Menage, without deciding, produces the Gr. Σικανος, a Sicilian, and Δικανικος, litium sectator, a contriver of litigation. The former, because the Sicilians were notorious for their treachery, and skill in deception. Wachter gives the same origin, (sc. Σικανος,) to the Fr. Sicaneur, or, as they now write it, chicaneur; and to the Ger. Schwicken, decipere, deducere, depravare; A. S. Swican, to betray, to deceive, to seduce. The editor of Menage is inclined to consider the A. S. Swican as the just etymology. To chicane is used to denote—

To invent subterfuges, artful pretexts; to wrangle, or dispute sophistically, litigiously, with intent to evade or postpone a judgment or decision.

To all this, the court of France, after some delays, consented: but that spirit of chicane and injustice, that had reigned so long in that court, did still appear in every step that was made: for they made use of equivocal terms, in every paper that was offered in their name.
Burnet. Own Time, an. 1696.

These will not believe, that when all Christendom was at peace, such a war could be begun merely upon a chicane, about the loss of a ship or two so many years since.
Sir W. Temple. Letter to Sir John Temple.

His anger caused him to destroy the greatest part of these reports; and only to preserve such as discovered most of the chicanery and futility of the practice.—Arbuthnot.

My Lord, were I given to chicaning as you call my being stopt by faults of grammar that disturb the sense, and make the discourse incoherent and unintelligible, if we are to take it from the words as they are, I should not want matter enough for such an exercise of my pen.
Locke. Second Reply to the Bp. of Worcester.

There have been, Sir, and there are, many who choose to chicane with their situation, rather than be instructed by it.
Burke. On Economical Reform.

I am innocent, gentlemen, of the darkness and uncertainty of your science. I never darkened it with abused and contradictory notions, nor confounded it with chicane and sophistry.—Id. A Vindication of Natural Society.

Are they not the identical men, who, from the base and sordid vices which belonged to their original place and situation, aspired to the dignity of crimes; and from the dirtiest, lowest, most fraudulent, and most knavish of chicaners, ascended in the scale of robbery, sacrilege, and assassination in all its forms, till at last they had imbrued their impious hands in the blood of their sovereign?
Id. On a Regicide Peace, Let. 3.

CHICHE. }
CHINCHE. }
CHI'NCHY. }
CHI'NCHERY. }

Fr. Chiche, chicherie; which Duchat concludes to be from the Lat. Sicus, dry. It (Chinche, chiche) seems to be formed from the A. S. Cinan, to chine or chink, to open, to gape; and to be applied to—

Gaping greediness, or covetousness, hungriness, voracity; and hence to—

Niggardliness, pinching sparingness, or parsimony.

A chichiface,—(Fr. Chiche-face,) now written and pronounced chitty-face, is—

A niggard, one having a niggardly, pinched, starved face; a pined, puny face.

Liveth more at ease and more as rich
Than doeth he that is chiche.—Chaucer. R. of the Rose.

For chinche and feloun is richesse
That so can chase hem and dispise
And hem defoule in sundrie wise
They louen full bette, so God me spede
Than doeth the rich chinchy grede.—Id. Ib.

For right as men blamen an avaricious man, because of his scarcitee and chincherie, in the same wise is he to blame, that spendeth over largely.—Id. The Tale of Melibeus.

But suche an other chinche as hee
Men witen nought in all the londe.—Gower. Con. A. b. v.

I stole but a dirty pudding out of an alms basket to give my dog, when he was hungry, and the peaking chitty-face page hit me in the teeth with it.
Massinger. The Virgin Martyr, Act ii. sc. 1.

CHICK, v. } Chuc, (says Junius,) is the call
CHICK n. } of the cock to the hens, when he CHI'CKEN. } has found a grain of corn. (See the example from Chaucer, Nonnes Priestes Tale, in v. Chuck.) Wachter also thinks the A. S. Cicen; Dut. Kieken; Ger. Kuchlein; and Eng. Chicken, are from the same source, viz. the call of the cock. The interchange of c or k and ch, is continual in our old language. Chick is applied to—

The young of various birds, (met.) to a young person.

Jerusalem, Jerusalem that sleest the prophetis and stonest hem, that ben sent to thee; hou ofte wolde I gedre togidere thi children as an henne gedereth here chykens under hir wyngis and thou woldest not!—Wiclif. Matthew, c. 23.

Jerusalem, Jerusalem which kyllest prophetes, and stonest them which are sent to the: how often would I haue gathered thy childrē together, as ye henne gathereth her cuickens vnder her wynges, but ye would not.

A coke they hadden with hem for the nones,
To boile the chickens and the marie bones.
Id. Prologue, v. 368.

By the twentie daie, (if the egs be stirred,) ye shall heare the chicke to peepe within the verie shell: from that time forward, it beginneth to plume and gather feathers; and in this maner lieth within the shell, the head resting upon the right foot, and the same head under the right wing.
Holland. Plinie, b. x. c. 53.

Letters came from Q. Minutius the Propretour out of the Bruttians countrey, that there was a colt foled with five feet, and three chickens hatched with three feet a peece.
Id. Livie, p. 810.

While men were hotly disputing whether the chick was first formed of the yolke or the white, our excellent Harvey made it evident, (which our own observations have confirmed to us,) that it is made of neither, but of the cicatricula or speck that appears on the coat of the yolk.
Boyle. Works, vol. iii. p. 471.

Scouring the watch grows out of fashion wit,
Now we set up for tilting in the pit.
Where tis agreed by bullies, chicken-hearted,
To fight the ladies first, and then be parted.
Dryden. Prologue to the Spanish Fryar.

The Druids, as well as the Etruscan and Roman priesthood, attended with diligence the flight of birds, the pecking of chickens, and the entrails of their animal sacrifices.

In the hour of danger it was shameful for the chief to be surpassed in valour by his companions; shameful for the companions not to equal the valour of the chief
Gibbon. History, c. 9.

It is by this principle [sympathy] chiefly that poetry, painting, and other affecting arts, transfuse their passions from one breast to another, and are often capable of grafting a delight on wretchedness, misery, and death itself.
Burke. On the Sublime and Beautiful.

It will be proper to state, that Mr. Nicholas Grueber, who preceded Mr. Barwell in chiefship of Dacca, in a letter dated 29th April 1775, declares that he paid to the committee of Circuit 12,000 rupees as their profit on a single salt farm.—Id. On the Affairs of India.

An old gentleman delighting himself with the recollection of better days, related, that forty years ago, a chieftain walked out attended by ten or twelve followers, with their arms rattling.—Johnson. A Journey to the Western Islands.

The laird of Raasa has sometimes disputed the chieftainry of the clan with Macleod of Skie.—Id. Letter to Mrs. Thrale.

The chieftainship of the highlandry is a very dangerous influence.—Smollet.

Being reduced into a cataplasm and so applied everie night and taken off in the day time, it [Sisymbrium,] healeth within four times laying on, the angrie chilblaines and bloudy-fals that trouble the feet in the night season.
Holland. Plinie, vol. ii. p. 16.

I remembred the cure of chilblains, when I was a boy, (which may be called the childrens gout,) by burning at the fire, or else by scalding brine, that has, (I suppose,) the same effect.—Sir W. Temple. Of the Cure of the Gout.

From the same cause, [the cold,] myself, as well as several of my people, had fingers and toes chilblained.

Child,—any thing begotten, born, or brought forth; especially, of woman born; any one having the qualities of a child, (e. g.) its weakness, ignorance, innocence, docility;—offspring; descendants generally, in near or remote succession; (met.) offspring, produce.

Childer-mass,—In commemoration of the murder of the children, (the Innocents.)

Mr. Steevens, in his note on the Shepherd's exclamation in Winter's Tale, "a boy, or child, I wonder;" observes, "that in some of our inland counties, a female infant, in contradistinction to a male one, is still termed among the peasantry, a child." On the other hand, G. Douglas renders "Puer Ascanius, Ascaneus the chylde." Surrey,—"the chylde Iulus." And the word is applied in our old writers of Ballads or Romances to any youth, or boy, whether knight or squire, or page. In R. Gloucester, (p. 182,) "Chyld Waweyn, Lotys sone, thulke tyme was bote of twelf ger," is in Geoffry of Monmouth, (quoted in the notes,) "Walwanus, filius predicti Loth. xii. annorum juvenis." And it is added in R. Gloucester, "the pope him toke armes, and ys owe honde made hym knyght." In Chaucer, (Flower & Leaf,) the attendants upon the knights, "with crownes of laurer grene," are distinguished by the name of childe. "And euery childe ware of leaves grene, a fresh chapelet upon his haires bright." In Spenser, Prince Arthur, a knight complete, is called "the noble childe," (Faerie Queene, b. vi. c. 8. s. 15.)

Junius remarks, that the verb, to child, occurs passim in Wiclif's English version of the Bible, (i.e. O. T.) "And Eve childed," &c.

Child is much used prefixed to other words, as child-birth, child-bed, &c.

Tho schal hande bi gete a child, sayn he wolde y wyte,—
What non that child schulde be, that he hande y gete.

Latimer. Second Sermon before King Edward.

For in your very childage, there appeared in you a certayne straunge and meruelous towardnes of suche prudencie, moderacion, mekenes, integritie, deuocion and godlines that euery man did hope that your grace wouldc be a wonderfull excellent prince in euery condicion perfite and absolute.
Udal. John, Pref.

These gentlewomen are exceeding fat, and the lesser their noses be, the fairer are they esteemed; they daube ouer their sweet faces with grease too shamefully; and they neuer lie in bed for their trauel in childbirth.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. I. p. 99.

For by reaō of such bringing vp: some after they become to sadder age, haue such childish and tender stomacks, that they can not abide to heare any thing of wisedom or sadnes, but delight altogether in bookes of peuish fables, which neither be true nor likely.
Vives. Instruction of Christian Women, b. II. c. 11.

In princes practices it is more childishness to tarry until the practices be set abrode: for then were it as good to tarry tin the trumpet sound wars.

Stirling. A Paraenesis to Prince Henry.

Jail. I do not think she was very well, for now
You make me mind her, but this very day
I ask'd her questions, and she answer'd me
So far from what she was, so childishly,
So wilily, as if she were a fool,
An innocent, and I was very sorry.
Beaum. & Fletch. Two Noble Kinsmen, Act iv. sc. 1.

Then doth the soul want work, and idle sit,
And thus we children are and ideots call,
Yet hath she then a quick and active wit,
If she had sight and tools to work withal.
Davies. Immortality of the Soul, s. 32.

He makes a Julyes day, short as December,
And with his varying childnesse, cures in me
Thoughts, that would thick my blood.
Shakespeare. Winter's Tale, Act i. sc. 2.

Certainly the best works, and of greatest merit for the publick, have proceeded from the unmarried or childless men, which both in affection and meanes have married and endowed the publick.—Bacon. Ess. Of Marriage.

You that expect e'er long to be invested with all the bliss and happiness that a creature is capable of, is it a comely thing for you in the mean while to spend your time in running after shadows, and in playing with childish gewgaws? In raking in the dirt or treading in the mire.
Beveridge, vol. II. Ser. 137.

But to return to the business of rewards and punishments, all the actions of childishness, and unfashionable carriage, and what ever time and age will of itself be sure to reform, being, as I have said,) exempt from the discipline of the rod, there will not be so much need of beating children, as is generally made use of.—Locke. Of Education, s. 72.

Nor must I here omit my worthy friend, Mr. Honeycomb, who has often told us in the club, that, for twenty years successively, upon the death of a childless rich man, he immediately drew on his boots, called for his horse, and made up to the widow.—Spectator, No. 311.

Instead of supposing ourselves to be perfect patterns of wisdom and virtue, it seems to me more reasonable to treat ourselves, (as I am sure we must now and then treat others,) like humoursome children, whose fancies are often to be indulged in order to keep them in good humour with themselves and their pursuits.—Sir Joshua Reynolds, Disc. 12.

We cannot be so childish as to imagine, that ambition is local, and that no others can be infected with it, but those who rule within certain parallels of latitude and longitude.
Burke. Remarks on the Policy of the Allies.

Children occasion toil, and a childless life is a state of destitution: the time of youth is a time of folly, and gray hairs are loaded with infirmity.—Adventurer, No. 107.

CHI'LIAD, n. } Gr. Χιλιας, one thousand.
CHI'LIAST. } The Millenarians were also called Chiliasts. See the quotation from Bayle.

The world then in the seventh chiliad will be assumed up unto God, snatch'd up by his spirit, inacted by his power.
More. Defence of Moral Cabbala, c. 2.

Marcinus published a book, which he intituled Chiliasmus enervatus. He dedicated this book to his adversary, and prudently represented to him, that the doctrine of the Chiliasts rendered the reformed religion odious to the supreme powers; for since they pretend that the prosperity of the church depends upon the destruction of all temporal powers, they excite the people to insurrections that they may bring in the golden age of Christianity, or the reign of a thousand years.—Bayle. Dictionary. Art. Marcinus, n. 1.

CHILIFICATION. } From Chyle, (qv.) and factus, past part. of CHILIFA'CTIVE. } facere, to make or cause
CHILIFA'CTORY. } to be.

The making or production of chyle.

Nor will we affirm that iron ingested, receiveth in the stomach of the ostrudge no alteration at all, but if any such there be, we suspect this effect rather from some corrosion, than any of digestion; not any liquid reduction or tendency to chilifaction by the power of natural heat, but rather some attraction from an acid and vitrious laudanity in the stomach, which may absterse and shave the scorious parts thereof.—Browne. Vulgar Errours, b. iii. c. 22.

Whether this be not effected by some way of corrosion, from sharp and dissolving humidities, rather than any proper digestion; chilifactive mutation, or elemental conversion, is with good reason doubted.—Id. Ib.

Wherein notwithstanding we should rather rely upon (if any such might be found) a chilifactory menstruum or digestive preparation drawn from species or individuals, whose stomachs peculiarly dissolve lapideous bodies.
Id. Ib. b. ii. c. 3.

Milton. Paradise Lost, b. v. l. 65.

In urns and altars round,
A drear and dying sound
Affrights the Flamens at their service quaint:
And the chill marble seems to sweat,
While each peculiar pow'r forgoes his wonted seat.
Id. Odes. Christ's Nativity. Hymn, v. 21.

Yet for all this there comes another strange gardener that never knew the soil, never handled a dibble or spade to set the least pot-herb that grew there, much less had endur'd an hour's sweat or chilness, and yet challenges as his right the binding or unbinding of every flower, the clipping of every bush, the weeding and worming of every bed, both in that and all other gardens there about.
Id. Animadversions upon the Remon. Defence.

But muse, thou seem'st to leave the Morelands too too long,
Of whom report may speak (our mighty wastes among)
She from her chilly site, as from her barren feed,
For body, horn, and hair, as fair a beast doth breed
As scarcely this great isle can equal.
Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 12.

Envious, malicious, and revengeful thoughts fix the heart, and put it into a raging flame and fury; fearful, despairing, and mistrustful thoughts chill it, and make it so cold, stupid, and unactive, that it cannot exert itself, nor employ all its powers and faculties as it ought to do.
Bp. Beveridge, vol. II. Ser. 125.

——— It strikes an awe
And terror on my aching sight: the tombs
And monumental caves of death look cold,
And shoot a chilness to my trembling heart.
Congreve. The Mourning Bride, Act II.

Ah! waste no more that bounteous bloom,
On night's chill shade, that fragrant breath:
Let sun-beg suns those gems illume!
Fair flower, to live unseen is death.
Langhorn. The Evening Primrose.

The social hearth when autumn's treasure's store

CHIMERA, n. } Lat. Chimæra; Gr. Χιμαιρα, adj. } Χιμαιρα, from Χιμαρος, a goat. (See Pope, Homer. Iliad, b. vi.) Applied to—Any capricious fancy, any wild imagination.

For e'en at first reflection she (the soul) espies,
Such strange chimeras, and such monsters there,
Such toys, such antics, and such vanities,
As she retires, and shrinks for shame and fear.
Davies. The Immortality of the Soul, Introd.

That neglect has been the true cause of chimeras; such as are (for instance) an absolute real time or space, a vacuum, atoms, attraction in the scholastick sense, a physical influence of the soul over the body, and a thousand other fictions, either derived from erroneous opinions of the ancients, or lately invented by modern philosophers.
Clarke. Leibnitz's Fifth Paper.

An enlightened reader laughs at the inconsistent chimera of our author, of a people universally luxurious, and at the same time oppressed with taxes and decaying in trade.
Burke. Observations on a late State of the Nation.

They have annexed to every species of knowledge some chimerical character of terror and inhibition, which they transmit, without much reflection, from one to another: they first fright themselves, and then propagate the panick of their schools and acquaintance.—Rambler, No. 5.

CHIMERE. Fr. Chamarre, cimarre; It. Zimarra; Sp. Chamarra, or chamarro; Dut. Samare; Sw. Samarra. Dr. Jamieson suggests that this term had its origin from a superior kind of cloth, made of fine goat's wool, and called by the Latins Cymatilis, from Gr. Κυμα, a wave, because it was scalloped. See Cymar.

The Fr. Chamarre is said by Cotgrave to be "a loose and light gown (and less properly a cloak) that may be worn scarf-wise."

The chimere [is] the upper robe, to which the lawn sleeves are generally sewed; which before and after the Reformation, in queen Elizabeth's time was always of scarlet silk: but Bishop Hooper scraping first at the robe itself, and then at the cuffs of it, as too light and gaudy for the episcopal gravity, it was changed for a chimere of black satin.
Wheatly. Common Prayer, ii. c. 4.

CHIME, v. } Dr. T. H. happily and ingeniously, ut solet, says Skinner, derives from the It. Chiamare; (Lat. Clamare, to call,) because that sound (sc. the chime of bells) calls or summons to church. Junius suspects that the expression formerly was a cimbal or cimble of bells, (see Cymbal,) whence cime or chime was formed. To chime, as applied generally, is—

To be or cause to be in the same tone or tune; in unison, in consonance; to attune, to harmonize, to correspond or agree, or coincide with.

The streme of lif now droppeth on the chimbe.
The asy tonge may wel ringe and chimbe
Of wrecchednesse, that passed is ful yore:
With ode folk, save dotage, is no more.
Chaucer. The Reves Prologue, v. 3894.

——— And right for fere
They weren dombe, and dare not telle,
Without sowne, as dothe the belle,
Whiche hath no clapper for to chyme.—Gower. Con. A. b. iv.

After that she was passed Ludgate she proceeded towarde Fletestrete where the Conduict was newely painted, and all the armes and angels refreshed, and the chyme melodiously sowning.—Hall. Hen. VIII. an. 25.

Then in a rage I took,
And out at window threw
Ovid and Horace, all the chiming crew;
Homer himself went with them too.
Hardly escaped the sacred Mantuan book.
Cowley. Ode. Of Verses of my Lord Broghills.

The voyce so sweet, the words so faire,
As some soft chime had stroke the ayre,
And though the sound were parted thence
Still left an eccho in the sense.—B. Jonson. The Mind.

That we on earth with undiscording voice
May rightly answer that melodious noise,
As once we did, till disproportion'd sin
Jarr'd against nature's chime, and with harsh din
Broke the fair music that all creatures made
To their great Lord. Milton. Ode at a Solemn Music.

Father and son, husband and wife, and such other correlative terms, seem so nearly to belong one to another, and their custom do so readily chime and answer one another in peoples memories, that upon the naming of either of them, the thoughts are presently carry'd beyond the thing so named, and nobody overlooks or doubts of a relation, where it is so plainly intimated.—Locke. Of Hum. Underst. b. ii. c. 25.

Love first invented verse, and form'd the rhyme,
The motion measur'd, harmonized the chime.
Dryden. Cymon & Iphigenia.

The book [Piers Plowmans vision] is writ in metre, but much different from the manner of our modern verse, there being no rhymes or chymano of words, but the nature of the metre is that three words, at the least, of each verse begin with one and the same letter.
Strype. Memoirs. Edward VI. an. 1550.

Various of numbers, new in ev'ry strain;
Diffus'd, yet terse, poetical tho' plain;
Diversify'd, midst unison of chime;

Chaste Dian, bathing: never saw I figures
So likely to report themselves.
Shakespeare. Cymbeline, Act ii. sc. 4.

Tenements are divided into two or more tiling houses, and chimneyless barns used to that purpose.
Fuller. Worthies. Merionethshire.

Acute distempers frequently arise from a diminution of transpiration through the cutaneous chimneys, and some chronical ones from an augmentation.
Derham. Physico-Theology, b. v. c. 5.

Moliere, as we are told by Monsr. Boileau, used to read all his comedies to a little old woman, that was his housekeeper, as she sat with him at her work by the chimney-corner; and could foretell the success of his play in the theatre, from the reception it met with at the fire side.
Spectator, No. 10.

The King, as he had come through the western countries, from the first landing had been in many places moved to discharge the chimney-money: and had promised to recommend it to parliament.—Burnet. Own Time, an. 1689.

But there are huts or dwellings of only one story, inhabited by gentlemen, which have walls cemented with mortar, glass windows, and boarded floors, of these all have chimneys, and some chimneys have grates.
Johnson. Journey to the Western Islands.

CHIN. } Goth. Kinnus; A. S. Cinne; Dut. Kinne; Ger. Kinn, from the A. S. Cinan, (Ger. Gienen,) hiare, dehiscere, to gape, to chine, chink, or rive, (Somner.) So called, says Skinner, because when the chin is drawn down, the mouth is opened. It is applied to—

CHINNED.

The central part, or part below the mouth of the opening jaw, or jaw that descends to effect an opening or yawning of the mouth.

And as a letherene pors, lolled his chekus
Al sydder (longer) than ye chyn, ychiveled for elde.

And whyles he pondreth these thinges in hys harte,
Hys knee, hys arme, hys hande susteyned hys chinne.
Wyat. The Auctor on Psalme 102.

——— Then like a faire yong prince,
First downe chinn'd, and of such a grace, as makes his lookes convince Contending eyes to view him: forth he went to meet the king. Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. xxiv.

I have observed that those little blemishes wear off very soon, but, when they disappear in any part of the face, they are very apt to break out in another, insomuch that I have seen a spot upon the forehead in the afternoon, which was upon the chin in the morning.—Spectator, No. 51.

The next in beauty, as in speed, appears
Fair Idas, in the strength of youthful years:
A party coloured down but just began
To shade his chin, the promise of a man.
Hurt. The Sixth Thebaid of Statius.

Beaum. & Fletch. The Scornful Lady, Act v. sc. 1.

His heart pierced and torn in divers lobes or pieces, three of his ribs broken, the chine-bone of his back cut almost in sunder, and under the point of the shoulder-blade, on the right side within the skin three bullets were found by the Lord Hunsdon.—State Trials. 27 Eliz. 1584. Inquisition upon the Death of the Earl of Northumberland.

I learned from him, that he had killed eight fat hogs for this season, that he had dealt about his chines very liberally among his neighbours, and that in particular he had sent a string of hogs puddings with a pack of cards to every poor family in the parish.—Spectator, No. 269.

He that in his day did chine the long rib'd Apennine.
Dryden.

CHINK, v. } The verb is not of common CHINK, s. } occurrence. A. S. Cinan; CHI'NKY. } To gape or chap, as the earth doth in dry weather; to chine, chink, or rive, (Somner.)

Rich beame of honour, shed your light
On these dark rymes; that my affection
May shine (through every chincke) to every sight
Graced by your reflection!
B. Jonson. Ode to James Earl of Desmond.

Those beams that irradiate only, and gild your honeysuckle fields, do scorch and parch this chinky gaping soil, and so put too many wrinkles upon the face of our common mother the earth.—Howell, b. i. s. 1. Let. 24.

——— Not in vain, th' industrious kind
With dawby wax and flow'rs, the chinks have lin'd,
And with their stores of gather'd glue, contrive
To stop the vents and crannies of their hive.
Dryden. Virgil, Geor. 4.

——— So poets sing
Grimalkin, to domestick vermin sworn
An everlasting foe, with watchful eye
Lies nightly brooding o'er a chinky gap,
Pretending her fell claws, to thoughtless mice
Sure ruin. J. Philips. The Splendid Shilling.

The fabrick of superstition has in this our age and nation received much ruder shocks than it had ever felt before; and through the chinks and breaches of our prison, we see such glimmerings of light, and feel such refreshing airs of liberty, as daily raise our ardour for more.
Burke. Vindication of Natural Society.

CHINK, v. } Tinnire, vox a sono ficta, (Skin-CHINK, n. } ner.) It seems to be formed from chinch, greediness, niggardliness, (see Chich,) and to be applied to that which the greedy or covetous are eager to get, and the niggardly to keep: to coin, or money; and thence to the sound of it in the bag, or when told: and further, to any sound similar to that of metallick pieces in collision.

Such is the worth of sack; I am (me thinks)
In the exchequer now; hark, how it chinks
And do esteme my venerable self
As brave a fellow, as if all the pelfe
Were sure my owne.—T. Beaumont. Vertue of Sack.

He chinks his purse, and takes his seat of state:
With ready quills the dedicators wait;
Now at his head the dextrous task commence,
And, instant, fancy feels th' imputed sense.
Pope. The Dunciad, b. iii. l. 107.

Not an extravagant young heir,
Beset with duns and in despair,
When joyful tidings reach the ear,
And dad retires by Heaven's commands,
To leave his chink to better hands;
E'er felt a joy in such excess,
As Frank reliev'd from this distress.
Somerville. Fables, c. 2.

At length the busy time begins,
"Come, neighbours, we must wag—"
The money chinks, down drop the chins,
Each lugging out his bag —Cowper. Yearly Distress.

Yon ancient prude, • • • •
With bony and unkerchief'd neck, defies
The rude inclemency of wintry skies,
And sails, with lappet head and mincing airs,
Duly, at chink of bell, to morning pray'rs.—Id. Truth.

The only comfort that I know
Is, that 't was said an age ago,
'Ere Milton soar'd in thoughts sublime,
'Ere Pope refin'd the chink of rhyme
Lloyd. An Epistle to Mr. Colman.

CHINTZ, n. A word of modern introduction into the English language from the Hindústanee; —written with z final, though z must be pronounced.

Chintzes are gaudy, and engage our eyes
Too much about the party-colour'd dyes.
Swift. Prol. to a Play for Benefit of Distressed Weavers.

And when she sees her friend in deep despair,
Observes how much a chintz exceeds mohair.
Pope. Moral Essays, Ep. 2.

The chamber in which they slept, breathes the richest and purest of all odours, unalloyed by the fumes, which cannot but arise, where the sleeper lies under two or three blankets and a quilt, for the bed covering here is nothing more than a single piece of fine chintz.
Cook. Voyages, vol. ii. b. iii. c. 12.

CHI'OPPINE, n. Sp. Chapin, which, Delpino says, is Arabic. Mr. Steevens (Shakespeare, vol. vii. p. 300,) calls it a high shoe, or rather a clog, worn by the Italians. Minshew,—a high cork shooe.

What, my young lady and mistress! by'r lady your ladyship is nearer heauen then when I saw you last, by the altitude of a choppine.—Shakespeare. Hamlet, Act ii. sc. 2.

I do wish myselfe one of my mistresse's cioppini. Another demands, why would he be one of his mistresse's cioppini? A third answers, because he woulde make her higher.
B. Jonson. Cynthia's Revels, Act ii. sc. 3.

The Venetian courtezan, after she has put off her lofty attire, and high chippines, almost pares away herself to nothing.—Fuller. Worthies. Wales generally.

CHIP, v. } Dut. and Ger. Kappen, cædere, secare, to chip or chop.
CHIP, n. } See To CHOP.
CHI'PPING, n. } To cut or hew into small

The chip falles in his ine.—R. Brunne, p. 91.

Right such thought is in mine heart, for commonly it is spoken, and for an olde prouerbe it is ledged: he that heweth to hie, with chippes he may lese his sight.
Chaucer. The Testament of Loue, b. i.

Their prymes and houres fal,
And lepe out of their lippes
Lyke sawdust or dry chippes.—Skelton. Colyn Clout.

Sol. Sirrah, what humor is the Prince of?
Fal. A good shallow young fellow he would haue made a good pantler, hee would haue chipp'd bread well.
Shakespeare. 2 Part Hen. IV. Act ii. sc. 4.

But he was also notoriously wanton, intolerably ambitious, a constant dissembler, prodigiously profuse, so that he had sunk his estate, had it not met with a seasonable support of abbey land, he being one of those who well warmed himself with the chippe, which fell from the felling of monasteries.
Fuller. Worthies. Staffordshire.

But. What are they, Andrew?
And. The one to blanch your bread from chippings base, and in a moment, as thou wouldst an almond; the sect of the Epicureans invented that.
Beaum. & Fletch. The Elder Brother, Act ii. sc. 3.

We always chuse to cut the old black-rined trees; for these have less sap, and require but little pains to chip or cut it.
Dampier. Voyage, an. 1676.

In front a parlour meets my ent'ring view;
Oppos'd, a room to sweet refection due.
Here my chill'd veins are warm'd by chippy fires,
Through the bor'd rock above, the smoke expires.
Savage. The Wanderer, c. 1.

From the marrowless bones of these skeleton establishments, by the use of every sort of cutting, and of every sort of fretting tool, he flatters himself that he may chip and rasp an empirical alimentary powder, to diet into some similitude of health and substance the languishing chimeras of fraudulent reformation —Burke. On the Nabob of Arcot's Debts.

CHIRK, v. } Dut. Circken, to chirp; "A. S.
CHI'RKING, n. } Cearcian, crepitare, garrire, to chatter; It. Stridere, to crash, to gnash, to creak, to make a noise, to charke, or, (as in Chaucer's language,) to chirke," (Somner.) See an example from Holland's Plinie under CHAMP.

And kisseth hire swete, and chirketh as a sparwe.
Chaucer. The Sompnoures Tale, v. 7386.

All full of chirking was that sory place.
Id. The Knightes Tale, v. 2006.

This hous was also ful of gigges

CHIRM, v. } Junius has Chirre, gemere in-
CHIRM, n. } star turturum; and in the Dut. Karien, korien, koerien, is, gemere instar turturis sive columbæ, to murmur like a dove. A. S. Cearian, ceorian, queri, to complain. Dr. Jamieson refers to Dut. Kermen, lamentari; and observes, that applied to birds, it denotes the mournful sound emitted by them, especially when collected together before a storm: and also their chirping. In Hall, it seems to be applied to the low note of chawing with sensual gratification. Chirk, chirm, chirp, must have the same origin, and differ little in their application.

O Troian kyng, that secrets hie of great Gods canst discus,
Whom Phœbus token trees and starres of heauen hath taught to skrie,
Both chirmyng toongs of birdes, and wynges of foul that swift doth flie.—Phaer. Virgill. Æneidos, b. iii.

What tho' he chires on purer manchets crowne,
Whiles his kind client grindes on blacke and browne.
Bp. Hall, b. v. Sat. 2.

For hee [Perkin Werbeck] was conueighed leasurely on horsebacke, (but not in any ignominious fashion) through Cheapside and Cornewall to the Tower; and from thence backe againe vnto Westminster, with the charme, [in the Latin version, cum choro,] of a thousand taunts and reproches.—Bacon. Hen. VII. p. 186.

CHI'ROGRAPH. } From the Gr. Χειρ, the CHIRO'GRAPHER. } hand, and γραφειν, to write.
A writing or graving with the hand. The words are confined almost entirely to legal usage.

CHI'ROMANCY. } From Χειρ, the hand,
CHI'ROMANCER. } and μαντευεσθαι, to fore-
CHIROMA'NTICAL. } tell.
Divination from inspection of the hands. See the quotation from Brown.

Chiromancy hath these aphorisms to foretell melancholy.
Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 59.

Nor do we observe it verified that there is much considerable in that doctrine of chiromancy, that spots in the top of the nails do signify things past; in the middle, things present; and at the bottom events to come. That white specks presage our felicity, blew ones our misfortunes. That those in the nail of the thumb have significations of honour, those in the fore-finger of riches, and so respectively in other fingers.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. v. c. 22.

With what equity chiromantical conjecturers decry these decussations in the lines and mounts of the hand!
Id. Cyrus Garden, c. 5.

The middle sort who have not much to spare,
To chiromancers cheaper art repair,
Who clap the pretty palm, to make the lines more fair.
Dryden. Juvenal, Sat. 6.

A pretence as groundless and silly, as the dreaming Oneirocriticks of their Artemidorus and Astrampsychus, or the modern chiromancy and divinations of gypsies.
Bentley, Ser. 4.

CHIRONO'MIC. Lat. Chironomia, the art of moving the hands (in oratory, dancing, &c.) Gr. Χειρονομ-ειν, to regulate the hands, from Χειρ, the hand, and νεμ-ειν, regere, to rule, to regulate. See the quotation.

In the original it is called sellatio, which means a motion of the hands, accommodated either to one's own or another's elocution. Our language does not supply a proper word for this gesture, as indeed we have too little occasion to find the want of it: chironomic art, so much studied by the antients, being in the number of those which have been so long since lost.—Melmoth. Note on Pliny, b. ix. Let. 34.

CHIRP, v. } Junius and Skinner think a
CHIRP, n. } sono ficta. Perhaps corrupted
CHI'RPING, n. } from Chark, (qv.) and Chirm.
The quotations sufficiently explain the usage.

Oft therefore have I chid my tender muse;
Oft my chill breast beats off her flutt'ring wing;
Yet when new spring her gentle rays infuse,
All storms are laid, again to chirp and sing
P. Fletcher. The Purple Island, c. 1.

As touching the manner of worshipping and adoring flashes of lightning, all nations with one accord and conformitie doe it with a kind of whistling or chirping with the lips.—Holland. Plinie, b. xxviii. c. 2.

No ill suspecting, fondly unawares,
Were all entangled in the fowler's snares:
Whose mournful chirping and their chattering cries,
Incites the owl before his hour to rise.
Drayton. The Owl.

Now the cold winds have blown themselves away
The frosts are melted into pearly dews,
The chirping birds each morning tell the news
Of cheerful spring and welcome day,
The tender lambs follow the bleating ewes.
Sir W. Temple. Horace, b. iii. Ode 29.

The yellow broom, where chirp the linnets gay,
Waves round the cave.—Mickle. Sir Martin, c. 2.

Sweet music went with us all the wood thro',
The lark, linnet, thrustle, and nightingale too;
Winds over us whisper'd, flocks by us did bleat,
And chirp went the grasshopper under our feet.
Byrom. A Pastoral.

One who works with the hand, performs manual operations (sc.) in the art of healing.

He died of a wound with an arrow in his arm, shot at him by one Bertrad or Peter Basile, which neglected at first, and suffered to rankle, or as other say, ill handled by an unskilful chyrurgeon, in four days brought him to his end.
Baker. Rich. I. an. 1199.

Gon. You rub the sore,

Seb. Very well.
Ant. And most chirurgeonly.
Shakespeare. Tempest, Act ii. sc. 1.

Soon after coming to Oxon, he [Edmd Plowden] spent 4 yeares more in the same studies there, and in Novr an. 1552. he was admitted to practice chirurgery and physic by the Ven. Convoc. of the said University.
Wood. Athenæ Oxon.

Chastity makes no work for a chirurgeon nor ever ends in rottenness of bones.—South, vol. ii. Ser. 1.

But these are rather chirurgical, than medicinal cures.
Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 27.

There are physicians in the islands, who, I believe, all practice chirurgery, and all compound their own medicines.
Johnson. A Journey to the Western Islands.

CHI'SEL, v. } Fr. Cisaille, cizell, ciseau;
CHI'SEL, n. } It. Cisello; Sp. Sinzel. Junius says, from Σχιζειν, scindere, to sever, or cut off; Skinner, from Scindere, scissio, (q.d.) scissellum. The tool in carpentry and masonry.

In the room of this we may put (as hath been before touched) a kind of tenderness, by the Italians termed Morbidezza, wherein the chizel, I must confess, hath more glory than the pencil; that being so hard an instrument, and working upon so unpliant stuff, can yet leave strokes of so gentle appearance.—Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 53.

It was one man's work to be all day cutting out bars of iron into small pieces with a cold chisel. And these were for the great purchases of hogs and goats.
Dampier. Voyage, an. 1687.

With chiseld bill a spark ill-set
He loosen'd from the rest,
And swallow'd down to grind his meat,
The easier to digest.—Green. The Sparrow & Diamond.

——— Bacon there
Gives more than female beauty to a stone,
And Chatham's eloquence to marble lips.
Nor does the chisel occupy alone
The powers of sculpture, but the style as much;
Each province of her art her equal care
Cowper. Task, b. i.

CHIT. } Dr. T. H. (see Skinner) con-
Chi'tchat. } jectures Chat to be so named quasi, kitten, a little cat; and the expression—a little puss—applied to a lively, pert child, seems to be of similar import with—a little chit.

Chit-chat,—childish chat or prattle; small talk.

Here lies a creature of indulgent fate
From Tory Hyde rais'd to a chit of state.
Dryden, Ep. 15.

"These little chits would make one swear,"
Quoth Orpheus, 'twixt disdain and fear.
"And dare those urchins jeer my crosses
And laugh at mine and Dice's losses?"
King. Orpheus. Eurydice.

For poverty, that famish'd fiend!
Advanc'd into the miser's place,
And star'd the stripling in the face,
Whose lips grew pale, and cold as clay,
I thought the chit would swoon away.
Cotton. Marriage. Vision, 7.

Look'd—just as coxcombs look on earth:
Then rais'd his chin, then cock'd his hat,
To grace this common place chit-chat.
Mallet. Cupid & Hymen.

CHITTERLING. Skinner derives from Ger. Kutteln, intestina. Wachter interprets Kutteln, exta secare, to cut the intestines; and derives it from Kutten, secare, to cut.

—— These I scorned,
From their plentiful horn of abundance, though invited:
But now I could carry my own stool to a tripe
And call their chitterlings charity and bless the founder.
Massinger. The Maid of Honour, Act iii. sc. 1.

But honour now prescribes the law;
The tyrant keeps her wild in awe;
For charity forbid to roam,
And not a chitterling at home.—Fenton. Widow's Will.

A knight ther was, and that a worthy man,
That fro the time that he first began
To riden out, he loued chiualrie,
Trouthe and honour, freedom and curtesie.
Chaucer. The Prologue, v. 45.

This Diomede, as bokes vs declare,
Was in his nedes prest and courageous,
With sterne voice, and mighty lymmes square,
Hardie, testife, strong, and chevalrous.—Id. Troilus, b. v.

But all the marche of thoccident

As he that was holle lorde and sire,
And helde through his chevalrie
Of all the worlde the monarchie.—Gower. Con. A. Prol.

But Mars, whiche of batailles is
The god, an eie had vnto this,
As he whiche was chivalrous,
It felle him to ben amorous. Id. Ib. b. v.

The Flemynges fought valyantly to defende the passage, and thegh assauted chyualrously.
Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. i. c. 31.

So to his steed he got, and gan to ride

He had not trained been in chevalree.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. ii. c. 3.

Old Nestor's sonne, Antilochus, was fourth for chivalrie
In this contention: his faire horses were of the Pylian breed,
And his olde father (coming neare) inform'd him (for good speed)
With good race notes: in which himselfe, could good instruction give.—Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. xxiii.

For all so many weekes, as the yeare has,
So many children he did multiply:
Of which were twentie sonnes, which did apply
Their mindes to praise, and chivalrous deeds.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. ii. c. 10.

These, as you see, ride foremost in the field,
As they the foremost rank of honour held,
And all in deeds of chivalry excell'd;
Their temples wreath'd with leaves that still renew;
For deathless laurel is the victor's due.
Dryden. The Flower and the Leaf.

Return, and, to divert thy thoughts at home
There task thy maids, and exercise the loom;
Employ'd in works that woman kind become,
The toils of war and feats of chivalry
Belong to men, and most of all to me.
Dryden. Homer. Iliad, b. vi.

The feudal institutions, by raising the military tenants to a kind of sovereign dignity, by rendering personal strength and valour requisite, and by making every knight and baron his own protector and avenger, begot that martial pride and sense of honour, which, being cultivated and embellished by the poets and romance writers of the age, ended in chivalry.—Hume. Hist. of England, vol. ii. Appendix 2.

When the old feudal and chivalrous spirit of fealty, which, by freeing kings from fear, freed both kings and subjects from the precaution of tyranny, shall be extinct in the minds of men,—plots and assassinations will be anticipated by preventive murder and preventive confiscation.
Burke. Reflections on the French Revolution.

CHIVER, now written shiver. Ger. Schauren; tremere ex gelu vel metu.

To shudder, to tremble with cold or fear.

Now I chiver, for defaut of heat
And hote as glede, now sodainly I sweat.
Chaucer. The Blake Knight.

For then cometh the blanche feuer

Gower. Con. A. b. vi.

CHOCK, v. Fr. Chocquer, to give a Shock, (qv.)

Now the churlish chaneil me do chock,
Now surging seas conspire to breede my carke,
Now fighting flouds enforce me to the rock,
Charybdis whelps and Scylla's dogs doe barke
Turbervile. Master Bin drowned in the Sea.

When the bells ring, the wood-work thereof [Ely Minster] shaketh and gapeth, (no defect, but perfection of structure,) and exactly chocketh into the joynts again, so that it may pass for the lively embleme of the sincere Christian, who, though he hath motum trepidationis, of fear and trembling, stands firmly fixt on the basis of a true faith.
Fuller. Worthies. Cambridgeshire.

CHO'CLEARY. Lat. Cochlea; Gr. Κοχλιας, a cockle; a word, says Vossius, which the author of Etymologicon Magnum supposes to be from Κοχλειν, i.e. γυριζειν, gyrare, to form gyres or circuits, because the shell of a cockle is tortilis et turbinata, is wreathed round.

For some [horns] are wreathed, some not: that famous one which is preserved at St. Dennis near Paris, hath wreathy spires, and chocleary turnings about it, which agreeth with the description of the Unicorn's horn in Ælian.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iii. c. 23.

Cho'colate, n. } Fr. Chocolat; It. Cioc-
Cho'colate, adj. } colato, Sp. Chocolate. So called because made of the cacao-nut.

See the quotation from Dampier.

The Spaniards that live here, instead of parching them [the cacao-nuts,] to get off the shell before they pound or rub them to make chocolate, do in a manner burn 'em to dry up the oil; for else they say, it would fill them too full of blood, drinking chocolate as they do five or six times a day.
Dampier. Voyages, an. 1682.

I shall send my correspondent, for the embellishment of his book, the names and history of those who pass their lives without any incidents at all, and how they shift coffee-houses and chocolate-houses from hour to hour, to get over the insupportable labour of doing nothing.—Spectator, No. 54.

With the dirt they appear nearly as black as a Negroe; and according to our best discoveries, the skin itself is of the colour of wood-soot, or what is commonly called chocolate colour.—Cook. Voyages, vol. ii. b. iii. c. 6.

Choir. } Fr. Chœur; It. Coro; Sp.
Cho'rister. } Choro; Lat. Chorus; Gr.
Choir-service. } Χορος, a multitude of singers and dancers, and therefore of rejoicers, from Χαιρειν, to rejoice, (Martinius.) See Quire. Applied not only to—

The singers, but also to the part of the church in which they are placed.

These tunes of reason are Amphion's lyre,
Wherewith he did the Theban city found:
These are the notes wherewith the heavenly choir
The praise of him which made the heav'n doth sound.
Davies. Immortality of the Soul, s. 1.

And let the roring organs loudly play
The praises of the Lord in lively notes;
The whales, with hollow throates,
The choristers the joyous antheme sing,
That all the woods may answer, and their eccho ring.
Spenser. Epithalamion.

Dear chorister, who from those shadows sends,
Ere that the blushing morn dare show her light,
Such sad lamenting strains, that night attends
(Become all ear,) stars stay to hear thy plight.
Drummond, s. 33.

Now did Ridley, Bishop of London, by his injunctions, order the altars in his diocese to be taken down, as occasions of great superstition and error, and tables to be set in their room in some convenient places of the chancel or choir.
Strype. Edw. VI. an. 1550.

Hath it not made you ready to praise and magnify his name, and to join with the choir of heaven in singing, "Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb for ever and ever." Rev. v. 13.—Bp. Beveridge, vol. i. Ser. 10.

And indeed for my part, Pyrophilus, I esteem the doctrine I have been pleading for of that importance, that I am persuaded, that he, that could bring philosophical devotion into the request it merits, would contribute as much to the solemnizing of God's praises, as the benefactors of choristers and founders of chaunteries.—Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 62.

Of the choir he was eminently careful: and, though he neither loved nor understood musick, took care that all the singers were well qualified, admitting none without the testimony of skilful judges.—Johnson. Life of Swift.

At a time when compositions in counterpoint were uncommon in the church, and when that part of our choir-service called the motet or anthem, which admits a more artificial display of harmony, and which is recommended and allowed in Queen Elizabeth's earliest ecclesiastical injunctions, was yet almost unknown, or but in a very imperfect state.—Warton. Hist. of English Poetry, s. 28.

CHOKE, v. Lye gives A. S. Aecocan, suffocare; he and Somner, Aecocod, suffocatus; but no authority. Skinner has no doubt that such a word formerly existed.

To suffocate, to strangle; to stop up the course or passage, to obstruct, or block up, so as to prevent the issue or progress, rise or growth.

And likewise here Christ sayd not this signifieth my body, but this is my body calling the sacrament, signe, token and memoriall of so great a thing, euen with the name of the very thing itself, thus doth S. Ambrose choke our sophisters.
Frith. Workes, p. 150.

Then, when he hath run out himselfe led forth
His desp'rate party with him; blown together

To poure into the sacred sea, my waves.
Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. xxi.

See! my chok'd streames no more their course can keep,
Nor roll their wonted tribute to the deep.—Pope. Id. Ib.

The place is so chokingly convictive that there can be no probable elusion of it.—Bp. Hall. Ser. 2 Pet. i. 10.

The Dutch speaking of the pains they were fain to take to dig away the snow, that covered the house, and choaked up their doors add, that in their laborious work "they were forced to use great speed, for they could not long endure without the house, because of the extreme cold, although they wore foxes skins about their heads, and double apparel upon their backs."—Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 617.

The inhabitants refusing to surrender them, retreated to a cavern, into which they thought their enemies unlikely to follow them. Macleod choked them with smoke, and left them lying dead by families as they stood.

Howsoever it cometh to pas I cannot tel, but of late your grace is grown in great choleryk fashions, whensoever you are contrained in that which you have conceived in your head.—Strype. Origin Sir W. Paget. G. G. From May, 1549.

His eyes did hurle forth sparkles fiery red,
And stared sterne on all that him beheld,
As ashes pale of hew and seeming dead:
And on his dagger still his hand he held,
Trembling through hasty rage, when choler in him swel'd.—Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. i. c. 4. s. 36.

Henry played with Lewis the heir of France at chess, and winning much money of him, Lewis grew choleryck, that he threw the chess men at Henry's face

Baker. Wm. I. an. 1087.

To this matter Sir John answered, he remembered not what speeches he then used, and said it might be he used some speeches choleryckly, as naturally he was wont to do, for it was his disposition.—State Trials. Sir John Perrot, an. 1592.

When choler overflows, then dreams are red
Of flames, and all the family of red,
Red dragons, and red beasts in sleep we view,
For humours are distinguished by their hue.

Dryden. The Cock and the Fox.

His [Boyle's] constitution indeed inclined him to be choleric; but he gained so perfect an ascendant over his passion, that it never appeared, except sometimes in his countenance upon a very high provocation.

Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 142. Life.

He had not gone far, before a "malignant and a turbaned Turk" had his choler roused by the calmness and assurance with which this infidel strutted about in the metropolis of true believers.—Burke. On a Regicide Peace.

"Come all into this nut," quoth she,
"Come creepe in, be ruld by me,
Each one may here a chooser be,
For room ye need not wrestle"

Drayton. Nymphidia. The Court of Fairy.

If our end is to serve God chusingly and greedily out of pure conscience of our duty, it is better in itself, and more safe to us.—Bp. Taylor. Holy Living, c. 4. s. 7.

We scorne that wealth should be the finall end,
Whereto the heavenly Muse her course doth bend;
And rather had been pale with learned cares,
Than pamper'd with thy coarse of chang'd fares.

Bp Hall, b. ii. Sat. 2.

He that has pen but in that fountain dips,
How surely will the chosen phrases fly,
And shed forth streams of choysest rhetory,
Waking celestial torrents out of poesy!

G. Fletcher. Christ's Victory and Triumph.

Neither the weight of the matter, of which 'tis [the cylinder] made, nor the round, vacant form of it, (which two matters with a great force, or steep declivity do necessarily contribute the motion of it,) are any more imputable to that dead, choiceless creature, than the first motion of it was supposed to be.—Hooker. Ecclesiastical Fundamentals, c. 16.

It was a chosen plot of fertile land,
Pinond'st wild waues set like a little nest,
As if it had by nature's cunning hand,
Been choysely picked out from all the rest,
And layd forth for ensample of the best

Waller. Sacharissa & Amoret.

In this specimen of the languages of places so near to each other, the names of different parts of the body are chosen, because they are easily obtained from people, whose language is utterly unknown, and because they are more likely to be part of the original stamen of the language, than any other, as types of the first objects, to which they would give names.—Cook. Voyages, vol. v. b. iii. c. 13.

I know not the origin of the House of Commons, but am very sure it did not create itself; the electors were prior to the elected: whose rights originated either from the people at large, or from some other form of legislature, which never could intend for the chosen a power of superseding the choosers.—Burke. On the Motion on the Middlesex Election.

When I contemplate the character of those, who require a husband of my enquiry, I know it is unnecessary to mention wealth; but when I reflect upon the prevailing manners of the age, and even the laws of Rome, which rank a man according to his possessions, it certainly claims some regard.

Melmoth. Pliny, b. i. Let. 14.

This might have been avoided by anchoring more to the west, but I made choice of my situation for two reasons; first, to be near the island we intended to land upon; and secondly, to be able to get to sea with any wind.

CHOP, v. CHOP, n. CHOP-HOUSE. } Dut. Kappen, concindere, concidere minutim, to cut into small pieces; Fr. Chopper, which Junius and others derive from Κοπτ-ειν, scindere, secare. Vossius from Mid. Lat. Capulare, to strike with a sword, to cut. Capulare from Capulus, the hilt or hold of a sword, a capiendo, quia ibi capitur, because by it the sword is held. To chop is—

To cut by blows, by striking, not by pressure, nor by drawing backwards and forwards, as with a saw; to cut into chips, bits or pieces.

Bote holy churche & charite, chopped a-den swich schryvers.

Piers Ploughman, p. 4.

Massinger. The Renegado, Act iv. sc. 1.

The chop fall'n hounds mean time are heard no more,
But silent range along the winding shore,
Hopeless alike the hunters lag behind
And give all thoughts of Reynard to the wind.

Brooke. The Fox-chase.

CHOP, v. CHOP, n. } To chop in or out,—seems to be —to strike in or out—suddenly;—with the quickness, suddenness of a blow or stroke. In the first example from Wilson, by "chop in," he appears to mean; "take in with the chops or chaps."

Thus also to chop logic, "to answer a snappish quid, with a knappish quo," as Holinshed expresses it.

And in many places where the text seemeth at the first choppe harde to be understad, yet the circumstaunces before and after, and often reading together, make it [illegible]

Tyndall. Works. Prologue, p. [illegible].

Some repeate one worde so often, that if such wordes could be eaten, and chopt in so oft as they are uttered out, they would choke the widest throat in al England.

Wilson. Arte of Rhetorique, p. 160.

He that commeth lately out of Fraunce, will talke French English, and neuer blush at the matter. And I [illegible] chops in with English Italienated, and applieth the Italian phrase to our English speaking.—Id. Ib. p. 104.

And whereas you charge me with malapertnes, in that I presume to chop logike with you being gouernour, by answering your snappish quid, with a knappish quo, I would wish you to understand, now, that you put me in mind of the distinction, that I as a subiect honour your regall authoritie, but as a nobleman I despise your dunghill gentrie.

Holinshed. Desc. of Ireland, b. i. c. 6.

——— Who has brought

Locke. Second Reply to Bp. of Worcester

As for the pleasantry of your countryman, I shall not pretend to meddle with that, since your Lordship who knows better than any body his way of carrying of locke was fain to give it off, because it was too rough. What work such a dangerous charge of locke would make with (such) an argument, who can tell?

Locke. Second Reply to Bp. of Worcester.

CHOP. } "To chop, and change," means
CHO'PPING. } "to bargain and change," from the A. S. Ceapian, to cheap, traffick, bargain, buy or sell.

A chopping wind or sea;—a changing wind or sea.

A simple change in faith it was
To leave the flower for the grasse,
Sith chopping will but make you bare
And spend your life in carck and care,
You might have taken better heede
Than left the grasse, and chose the weede.

Turberville. The Forsaken Lover.

Whereat full oft I amblde, to see how all these three,

CHORD, n. } Gr. Χορδη, intestinum, and
CHO'RD, v. } hence Chorda, i. e. fides, ex intestino contorto, et arefacto, (Lennep.) To the same purport is Vossius, (sc.) because they (the chords or strings of a musical instrument) were usually made of the smaller intestines of animals. Hence applied more generally. See CORD.

A musical instrument, the strings of which were made of dried and twisted gut or intestine.

After dynner a young man, an Italyen, played before the King on a corde very well.—Leland. Fyancell of Margaret.

The wiry chords now shake so wondrous clear
As one might think an angel's voice to hear
From every quaver, or some spirit had pent
Itself of purpose in the instrument.

Drayton. David & Goliah.

——— Others, [tents] whence the sound
Of instruments that made melodious chime,
Was heard, of harp and organ; and who moov'd
Their stops and chords was seen.

Milton. Paradise Lost, b. xi. l. 561.

And now laborious, with a weighty hand,
He strikes into the chords with solemn pace,
To give the swelling tones a bolder grace;
And now the left, and now by turns the right,
Each other chase, harmonious both in fight.

Philips. The Fifth Pastoral.

It might easily be shown, that a divine will not be the worse accomplished in his profession for an accurate knowledge of the proportions of architecture, or the divisions of the musical chord.—Horsley. Charge, 1796.

Now as I wander'd through the lonely grove,
Where tow'rs of state, and lowly cottage rise,
How shall I tune the chord of woe to love,
Or stay the gushing torrent from my eyes.

Every fix'd star, in the now-received hypothesis, is a sun or sun-like body, and in like manner encircled with a chorus of planets moving about it.—Ray. On the Creation, pt. i.

And while in pomp at Cytherea's shrine,
With choral song and dance, our vows we join;
Her flaming altar with religious fear
I'll touch. Fenton. Phaon & Sappho.

For the difference which the use of chorus makes is this: the modern drama contents itself with a fact represented; the ancient requires it to be represented before spectators.

Mason. Elfrida, Let. 3.

When the words are attended to by the eye there is a plaintive cast in the strain which makes the well known anthem, "I call and cry," somewhat affecting; I think, however, a modern composer would judge ill if he chose to set the same words chorally.—Id. Church Music, p. 116.

CHOUGH, n. A. S. Ceo; Fr. Chouca, Skinner derives from the sound which the bird utters. It is the name by which the common Jackdaw (Corvus monedula) is sometimes called in England. The Cornish Chough is the Red-legged Crow, (Corvus graculus.)

Of his intemperate speech and railing upon Achilles, you may read Homer, Iliad, l. 3. That which Ammianus alludeth unto is, where he compareth his prating to the untunable chattering of choughes and dawes.

Holland. Ammianus. Annotations, p. 462.

If this Scotch garboils do not fudge to our minds, we will pell-mell run amongst the Cornish choughs presently, and in a trice.—Ford. Perkin Warbeck, Act iv. sc. 2.

CHOULE. Usually written Jowl, (qv.)

In [illegible] is one part omitted more remarkable than any other, that is the chaule, or crop adhering unto the lower side of the bill, and so descending by the throat: a bag or satchel very observable, and of a capacity almost beyond credit.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. v. c. 1.

CHOUSE, v. } Ihre and Serenius both refer
CHOUSE, n. } to the Sw. Kusa, which the first interprets fascinare, and the latter nugari. Skinner and Junius conceive, that to chouse and to cozen have the same origin. (See To COZEN.) They deduce to cozen from the Dut. Kozen or koozen, which Kilian interprets blandiri, adulari. Dr. T. H. (in Skinner) thinks the word is taken from the Turkish, Chiaous, a messenger of the Turkish Emperor; and Mr. Gifford confirms this conjecture. A messenger, or chiaous, (written by Hackluyt, chaus,) from the Grand Signior, in 1609, committed a gross fraud upon the Turkish and Persian merchants resident in England, by cheating them out of 4000*l*. Hence, from the notoriety of the circumstance to chiaous, chause, or chouse, was to do as this chiaous did; (sc.) to cheat, to defraud. (See Gifford's B. Jonson, iv. 27.) Buther, a man of undoubted learning, perhaps coined "caldes'd," in the passage quoted from him below, as a matchword to chous'd. Chouse, the noun, however, is applied not to him who chouses, but to him who is choused.

To deprive of by a trick, a cheat, a fraud.

Wherefore if your honor do not get out two letters of the Grand Signior as aforesayd, and send them hither with all speed by some one of your gentlemen, accompanied with a clause of the court, or some other of the Grand Signior's servants, it is impossible that our English ships can escape freely from these or the Christians.

As one would say, doe you think I am a Turke?

B. Jonson. Alchemist, Act i. sc. 4.

He stole your cloak, and pick'd your pocket,
Chous'd and caldes'd ye like a blockhead:
And what you lost I can produce,
If you deny it, here i' th' house.—Hudibras, pt. ii. c. 3.

For which reason, however, they may pretend, to chouse one another, they make but very awkward rogues; and their dislike to each other is seldom so well dissembled but it is suspected.—Tatler, No. 213.

He that with injury is griev'd,
And goes to law to be reliev'd,
Is sillier than a scottish chouse,
Who, when a thief has robb'd his house,
Applies himself to cunning men,
To help him to his goods again. Hudibras, pt. iii. c. 3.

CHRISM, n. and adj. Variously written; Chrisome, cresome, chrism. Fr. Chresme; It. Chresima; Sp. Crisma; from the Gr. Χρισμα, an ointment, from χριειν, to anoint. Applied to—

The sacred oil, which was formerly used in the administration of baptism; also to the cloth, with which the infant was, at or immediately after baptism, covered. A chrisome child is a child in its chrisome cloth. See Steevens's Shakespeare, Hen. V. Act ii. sc. 3. n. 4.

He had as leue sande as holy salte, and be smered with vnhalowed butter as anoynted with the holye chrisme, whiche he calleth charmed oyle.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 877.

I say moreouer that their annoynting is but a ceremonie borowed of the Jewes, though they haue somewhat altered the maner, and their shauing borowed of the heathen priestes, and that they be no more of their priesthood, than the oyle, salte, spittell, taper and chrisme clothe of the substaunce of baptisme.—*Tyndall. Corbet. To the Lord Mordaunt.

The 18th of Januarie, William Lord Somerset, Earle of Worcester, began his iourney towards France, to the christening of ye king's daughter there, instead of the Queene's maiesty of England, who sent with him a font of golde for that purpose.—Stow. Queen Elizabeth, an. 1573.

In praying therfore, and in the outward work of deuotion, this king we see hath not at all exceeded the worst of kings before him. But herin the worst of kings, professing Christianism, have by far exceeded him.
Milton. Eiconoclastes, s. 1.

Saint Augustine was resolute in points of christianitie to credite none, how Godly and learned soeuer he were, vnlesse he confirmed his sentence by the Scriptures, or by some reason not contrarie to them.
Hooker. Ecclesiasticall Politie, b. ii. s. 4.

But till it be thus improv'd and built upon, till this excellent piece of philosophy be, as Clemens saith of the Pagan school τελειουμενη δια χριστου, baptized by that Baptist, christianiz'd by the addition of repentance, till the thorns that are now in the flesh, enter to the pricking and wounding of the heart.—*Hammond. Grafton. King John, an. 13.

And it is very irregular and unreasonable to measure any action by a rule that belongs not to it, to try the exactness of the circle by the square, which should be done by the compass, and in like manner to judge the christianness of an action, by the law of natural reason, which can only be judged by its conformity with the law of Christ, superiour to that of nature.—Hammond. Works, vol. i. p. 210.

Do but turn over that charitable and irrefragable discourse of christianography; let your eyes but walk over those ample territories and large regions which in most parts of the habitable world (but especially in Europe, Africa, and Asia) profess the blessed name of God our Redeemer, and look to be saved by his blood: and then ask your heart if you dare entertain so uncharitable a thought as to exclude so many millions of weak, but true believers out of the church below, or out of heaven above.
Bp. Hall. Christian Moderation, b. ii. s. 14.

An heir male [Edward VI.] being now happily given to the realm, after so many a long year's expectation, the christening was performed with the greater solemnity; which, since our historians are silent in, I shall set down at length.—Strype. Memoirs. Edw. VI. an. 1537.

But the christian doctrine differs from all these schemes in these particulars: 1. It proposes nothing like a state of happiness in this world, either in the goods of fortune or otherwise. 2. It offers the best arguments for patience in this world, and for happiness in another. 3. It makes our greatest happiness here to lie in dependence of God's providence and contentment in our conditions.
Stillingfleet, vol. iii. Ser. 10.

To show how late it was before necessity gained admittance in the church, and became as it were christianized, with respect to our present subject, I may observe that Archbishop Anselm, of the eleventh and twelfth century, yea and Alexander Hales of the thirteenth, were yet scrupulous of making use of the term.—Law. Enquiry, pt. ii. c. 1.

These short afflictions, as the apostle speaks, 2 Cor. iv. 10, which are but for a moment, will work for thee a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. This is, in some measure, true of all afflictions and sufferings of God's sending, that are patiently and christianly borne.
Sharp. Works, vol. vi. Ser. 14.

Some boys are rich by birth beyond all wants,
Belov'd by uncles and kind good old aunts;
When time comes round, a christmas-box they bear,
And one day makes them rich for all the year.
Gay. Tricia, b. ii.

I once met with a page of Mr. Baxter's under a christmas-pye. Whether or no the pastrycook had made use of it through chance, or waggery, for the defence of that superstitious viand, I know not; but, upon the perusal of it, I conceived so good an idea of the author's piety, that I bought the whole book.—Spectator, No. 85.

Joseph Addison was born on the 1st of May, 1672, at Milston, of which his father Launcelot Addison, was then rector, near Ambrosebury, in Wiltshire, and, appearing weak and unlikely to live, he was christened the same day.

Warton. The Progress of Discontent.

I am persuaded that toleration, so far from being an attack upon christianity, becomes the best and surest support that possibly can be given to it. The christian religion itself arose without establishment, it arose even without toleration, and whilst its own principles were not tolerated, it conquered all the powers of darkness, it conquered all the powers of the world.
Burke. On a Bill for the Relief of Protestant Dissenters.

A christian's wit is inoffensive light,
A beam that aids, but never grieves the sight;
Vig'rous in age, as in the flush of youth,
'Tis always active on the side of truth;
Temp'rance and peace insure its healthful state,
And make it brightest at its latest date.
Cowper. Conversation.

CHROMA'TICK, adj. CHROMA'TICAL. } Gr. Χρωμα, colour. Applied in painting, and also in music. See the quotation from Dryden.

For never yet to this day did the tragedy use chromatick music nor rhyme, whereas the cithern or lute, which by many ages is more ancient than the tragedy, used it even from the very beginning. And evident it is that chroma is of greater antiquity than is harmony.
Holland. Plutarch, p. 1022.

Why among sundry kinds of musick, that which is called chromatical delighteth, enlargeth, and joyeth the heart, whereas the harmonical contracteth and draweth it in, making it sad and dumpish.—Id. Ib. p. 486.

But by the way repeated the oh-hones
Of his wild Irish and chromatick tones.
Butler. Prologue to the Queen of Arragon.

I am now come, though with the omission of many likenesses, to the third part of painting, which is called the chromatique or colouring. Operum colores is the very word which Horace uses to signify words and elegant expressions.

The second aggravation [of the Atheists folly] is the continuance and duration of his fury, a lasting chronical passion, quite contrary to the nature of passions,—a flash of lightning lengthned out a whole day together.
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 580.

The like mistake there is in a tradition of our dayes; men conceiving a peculiar danger in the beginning dayes of May, set out as a fatal period into consumptions and chronical diseases.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iv. c. 12.

I thought to have presented you with some of my medicated bread by the return of Thomas Egerton, which I made with scurvy grass, sage, or any other herb, and find it very useful, and a good way to prevent and cure divers of the chronical diseases, that are common in this over humid island.—Boyle. Works, vol. vi. p. 321.

These chronic passions, while from real woes
They rise, and yet without the body's fault
Infest the soul, admit one only cure;
Diversion, hurry and a restless life.

Shakespeare. Coriolanus, Act v. sc. 3.

A chronicler should well in diuers tongues be seene,
And eke in all the arts he ought to haue a sight.
Whereby he might the truth of diuers actions deeme,
And both suppine the wants, correct that is not right.
He should haue eloquence, and full and fitly write,
Not mangle stories, snatching heere and there:
Nor glose to make a volume great appeare.

He should be of such countenance and wit,
As should giue witnesse to the histories he writes;
He should be able weil his reasons so to knit,
As should continue well the matter he recites:
He should not praise, dispraise, for fauour or despites,
But should so place each thing in order due
As might approue the stories to be true.
Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 183.

Kath. After my death, I wish no other herald,

Shakespeare. Hen. VIII. Act iv. sc. 2.

All which noted by his chronicler, was strait written to the Duke, that with much desire expected it.
Shelton. Don Quixote, vol. iv. c. 4.

They made ready to walk the round; the steward, the secretary, and carver went with him, and the chrono(s')clist, that was careful to keep the register of his actions, together with constables and notaries.—Id. Ib. vol. iv. c. 8.

"Old chronicle," he said, "among the rest,
You might have nam'd Alcides at the least:
Is he not worth your praise?" the Pylian Prince
Sigh'd ere he spoke; then made this proud defence.
Dryden. Ovid. Met. b. xii.

But though this moral be incidentally enforced, Shakspeare has suffered the virtue of Cordelia to perish in a just cause, contrary to the natural ideas of justice, to the hope of the reader, and, what is yet more strange, to the faith of chronicles.—Johnson. On King Lear.

All the Americans that we have seen, since our arrival on that coast, were rather low of stature, with round chubby faces, and high cheek bones.—Cook. Voy. vol. vi. b. iv. c. 9.

CHUCK, v. CHUCK, n. CHU'CKLE. Chuck, says Junius, is the call of the cock to the hens, when he has found a grain of corn. (See CHICK.) He refers to the passage quoted from Chaucer,

To chuck, (if not to chock, qv.) is also to strike under the chin, so as to produce a sound from the collision of the upper and lower jaw, similar to that of the cock; to strike, to toss, to cast, to throw.

Also to make a chucking or chuckling noise; in derision, mockery or triumph. And thus we also use—to crow over.

And with that word he flew down fro the beme,
For it was day, and eke his hennes alle:
And with a chuk he gan hem for to calle
For he had found a corn, lay in the yerd.
Chaucer. The Nonnes Preestes Tale, v. 15,180.

Cambridge. Poems. George Birch to Mr. C.

Labour stood still as he passed,—the bucket hung suspended in the middle of the well,—the spinning wheel forgot its round,—even chuck farthing and shuttle cap themselves stood gaping till he had got out of sight.
Sterne. Tristram Shandy, c. 10.

CHU'ET, n. Mr. Steevens in his note upon the expression of Prince Henry, "Peace, chewet, peace," observes that in an old Book of Cookery, printed in 1596, he found a receipt to make chewets, which, from their ingredients, seem to have been fat greasy puddings; and to these, he adds, it is highly probable that the Prince alludes. The word is probably from the verb, to chew.

As for chewets, which are likewise minced meat, instead of butter and fat, it were good to moisten them, partly with creame, or almond, or pistachomilk, or barley, or maize creame.—Bacon. Nat. Hist. § 64.

CHUFF, n. CHU'FFY. I know not, says Skinner, whether from the A. S. Cyff; the Ger. Kuffe, a cask or barrel, by a metaphor sufficiently elegant; particularly if, as I suspect, it was primarily spoken of a clown, large, and burly, given both to gluttony and drunkenness. And see the example from Massinger.

Chough seems to include within it the signification of huff, i.e. heaved, raised, swollen (sc.) with anger, vexation; from the A. S. Heofan, to raise: heof, with the usual prefix ge, would give ge-heof; and by the change of g into c, ceof, cuff, cyf, the large vessel; and by softening the c into ch, would be formed chuff, the burly, swollen man; swollen either with gluttony and guzzling, or with ill tempers. It is applied to—

A selfish, ill-humoured fellow.

The chiding chuffe began to chafe,
and (sparefull of his cheere)
Demaunded of the selly beast and sayde what makste thou heere?
Turbervile. A Couetous Niggard and a Needy Mouse.

Which wordes whan they were blowen to Kynge Willyam's eryn, he was greuously discontent, and sayd whanne I am churched I shall offer to him a thousande candelesys lyght, with yᵉ whiche he shall holde hym smally contented.
Fabyan, vol. vi. c. 222.

And the Duke thought to returne to Tholouse, to se the good lady his wife, who was as thē newly churched of a fayre sonne, and he thought at her churchyng to kepe a great feest at Tholouse.—Berners. Froissart. Cron vol i. c. 322.

And the King feasted them right honorably, and so did the Queene, who was then newly churched of a sonne called Joan of Gaunt.—Grafton. Edw. III. an 15.

Nor shall proud Lancaster vsurpe my right,
Nor hold the scepter in his childish fist,
Nor weare the diademe vpon his heade,
Whose churchlike humors fits not for a crown.
Shakespeare. 2 Part Hen. VI. Act i. sc. 1.

Whatsoever church pretendeth to a new beginning, pretendeth at the same time to a new churchdom, and whatsoever is so new is none: so necessary it is to believe the holy catholick church.—Pearson. On the Creed, Art. 9.

They [the Jews] were his own also by the right of churchship, as selected and enclosed by God from amidst all other nations, to be the seat of his worship, and the great conservatory of all the sacred oracles and means of salvation.
South, vol. iii. Ser. 8

A church is a religious assembly, or the large fair building where they meet; and sometimes the same word means a synod of Bishops or Presbyters; and in some places it is the Pope and a General Council.—Watts. Logic, pt. i. c. 4. s. 6.

But the sound of the church-going bell
These vallies and rocks never heard;
Ne'er sigh'd at the sound of a knell,
Nor smil'd when a Sabbath appear'd.
Cowper. Alexander Selkirk.

CHURL. CHU'RLISH. CHU'RLISHLY. CHU'RLISHNESS. A. S. Ceorle; Ger. Kerl; Dut. Kaerle. Carel or Karl, in the ancient language of the Germans, signifies robust and strong.

A churl or carl is a robust, strong man; a rustick, labouring man; uncivilized, unpolished, rude, brutal, ill-humoured, selfish.

And goure fraunchises that free was, fallen is to thraldom
And alle goure children chorles.—Piers Ploughman, p. 345.

For may no cheerl a chartre make, hus catel selle
With oute leve of the lorde. Id. Ib. p. 204.

For vilains sinful deedes make a cherl.
Chaucer. The Wif of Bathes Tale, v. 6740.

And yet ne greveth me nothing so sore
As that the old cherl, with lokkes hore,
Blasphemed hath oure holy covent eke.
Id. The Sompnoures Tale, v. 7764.

And in his herte he caught of it gret routhe,
Considering the best on every side,
That fro his lust yet were him lever abide,
Than do so high a cherlish wretchednesse
Agein fraunchise and alle gentilesse.
Id. The Frankeleines Tale, v. 11,827.

The treason and eke tyme is shape,
So fell that this churlishe knape
Hath lad this maiden where he woulde
Vpon the stroud. Gower. Con. A. b. viii.

By the bere is signified the Persik kingdom, a beast lesse lently the the lyon and especially in his rede age when he is most chorlyssche greder to deuower and very false.
Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, c. 7.

Now ought not the cruelnesse and the churlishnesse of father and mother, of husband, master, lord or kyng, cause vs to hate the commaundement of our so kynde a Lord Christ.—Tyndall. Workes, p. 92.

Wrong not thy fair youth, nor the world deprive
Of these rare parts which nature hath thee lent,
'Twere pity thou by niggardise should'st thrive,
Whose wealth by waxing craveth to be spent;
For which, those of the wisest shall be shent,
Like to some rich churl hoarding up his pelf,
Both to wrong others, and to starve himself.
Drayton. The Legend of Matilda the Fair.

Churlish despite ne'er look'd from his calm eye,
Much less commanded in his gentle heart.
P. Fletcher. The Purple Island, c. 11.

But you are the first professour of the Gospell that euer I heard so churlishly to vse so reuerent, so learned, so paynfull, so sound a father, being also an earnest and zelous professour.—Whitgift. Defence, p. 522.

The third, [impediment is] when they [kingdoms] have conceived an apprehension of the difficulty and churlishness of the enterprise, and that it is not prepared to their hand.
Bacon. Upon the Motion of Subsidy.

To those whom thou hast or shalt permit to live to the age of a man, give competent strength and wisdome: take from them covetousness, churlishness, pride, and impatience.
Bp. Taylor. Holy Living. Prayers.

Thus, in a brute, their ancient honour ends,
And the fair mermaid in a fish descends
The line is gone: no longer duke or earl,
But by himself degraded, turns a churl
Dryden. The Wife of Bath's Tale.

And as for those operative minerals, quicksilver and antimony, long experience of their churlish and untractable nature has made many of the wariер physicians and chymists shy to meddle with either of them single.
Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 147.

Not the ruby faced sot that topes world without end,
Not the drone who can't relish his bottle and friend
Not the fool that's too fond, nor the churl that's unkind,
Neither this, that, nor t' other's the man to my mind.
Cunningham. A Man to my Mind.

Yet half mankind maintain a churlish strife
With him the donor of eternal life,
Because the deed by which his love confirms
The largess he bestows, prescribes the terms
Cowper. Hope.

CHURN, v. CHURN, *n. CHU'RNING, *n. From A. S. Cyrran, cerran; Ger. Kehren; Dut. Keeren; vertere, revertere, to move backwards and forwards; Chyren, chyr'n, churn, is the past part. of Cyrran; and so called (says Skinner) quia ad separandam butyrum clava huc illuc valide circumagitur: because to separate the butter, the staff is sharply turned about.

A vessel in which, by constant turning of milk, butter is made.

——— Are you not hee,
That frights the maidens of the villagree
Skim milke, and sometimes labour in the querne,
And bootlesse make the breathlesse huswife churne.
Shakespeare. Midsummer Night's Dream, Act ii. sc. 1.

In summer time there needs no more to do but to presse it [the butyr] forth from the milke after much shaking and often agitation in certain long vessels (called cherns) having in the very mouth a little narrow hole to receive the air and give vent to that within, or else otherwhiles stopped close, and bound up with some cloth.
Holland. Plinie, b. xxviii. c. 9.

This kind of cherne-milke, soure milke, or sulli-milk, call it what you will, is thought to be the most wholesome for the stomache.—Id. Ib.

Now in the cherning, they use to put thereto a little water, to the ende that the milke may soure the sooner.—Id. Ib.

A man may milk a beast till the blood come. Churn milk and it yeeldeth butter; but wring the nose and the blood followeth.—B. Jonson. Discoveries.

——— At early day,
Sweet slumber shaken from her opening lids,
My lovely Patty to her dairy hies:
There from the surface of expanded bowls
She skims the floating cream, and to her churn
Commits the rich consistence.—Dodsley. Agriculture, c. 3.

CHYLE. CHY'LOUS. It. Chilo; Sp. Chylo; Fr. Chyle, chylose; Lat. Chylus; Gr. Χυλος, from Χυ-ειν, to pour, because the moisture, which substances pour forth, whether it be by bruising, chopping or other means, is so called. From the same origin is Chyme, Gr. Χυμος, moisture or juice.

Cotgrave calls it, the white juice of digested meat: the matter whereof our blood is made. The word, he adds, originally signifies, a juice concocted by heat unto a consistence, that holds both of moisture and dryness.

Chilifaction, and Chilifactive, (see ante,) are used by medical writers; and Arbuthnot calls the vessels which make chyle—chylopoetick.

[We have] thus far pursued the food to the place, where, by its reduction into chyle, it becomes a proper aliment for the body.—Derham. Phys. Theol. b. iv. c. 11.

Milk, is the chylous part of an animal already prepared.
Arbuthnot. On Aliments, c. 6.

Whether the recipient dog [sc. of transfused blood] being before hungry, will not lose his appetite more than if the emittent dog's blood had not been so chylous.
Boyle. Works, vol. iii. p. 153.

We have now the aliment in the intestines converted into pulp; and, though lately consisting of ten different viands, reduced to nearly an uniform substance, and to a state fitted for yielding its essence, which is called chyle, but which is milk, or more nearly resembling milk than any other liquor with which it can be compared.—Paley. Nat. Theol. c. 10.

CHYMIST. CHY'MISTRY. CHY'MICK, *adj. CHY'MICK, *n. CHY'MICAL. CHY'MICALLY. CHYMI'STICAL. Fr. Chymique; It. Chimico; Sp. Chymico. Perhaps from Χυμα, from Χεειν, to pour; for he, says Vossius, who pours or mixes metals, changes them and converts the baser to the purer. See ALCHEMIST.

For she a chymist was and Nature's secrets knew,
And from amongst the lead, she antimony drew.
Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 26.

Is it to boast that verse has chymick power,
And that its rage (which is productive heat)
Can these receive as chymists raise a flow'r,
Whose scatter'd parts their glass presents compleat.
Davenant. Gondibert, b. i. c. 4.

Where, dreaming chymics! is your pain and cost?
How is your oil, how is your labour lost!
Our Charles, blest alchymist (though strange, Believe it, future times!) did change
The iron age of old
Into an age of gold. Cowley, Ode 5.

Ernestus Burgravius a disciple of Paracelsus hath published a discourse, in which he specifies a lampe to bee made of mans bloud, lucerna vitæ et mortis index, so he termes it, which chymically prepared 40 dayes and afterward kept in a glasse shall shew all the accidents of this life.
Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 281.

Paracelsus and his chymicall followers, as so many Promethei, will fetch fire from heaven, will cure all manner of diseases with minerals, accounting them the only physick.
Id. Ib. p. 347.

The chemists [in China] apply themselves chiefly to the search of the universal medicine, for health and long life, pretending to make men immortal, if they can find it out.
Sir W. Temple. Of Heroic Virtue, s. 2.

Sometimes she flies like an industrious bee,
And robs the flowers by Nature's chymistry.
Dryden. The Art of Poetry. Ode, c. 2.

Yet Paracelsus, about two hundred years ago, endeavoured to overthrow the whole scheme of Galen, and introduce a new one of his own, as well as the use of chymical medicines; and has not wanted his followers and admirers ever since, who have, in some measure, compounded with the Galenists, and brought a mixed use of chymical medicines into the present practice.—Sir W. Temple. Health & Long Life.

Chymically analysed blood yields store of volatile sulphureous, but, (as far as our trials have hitherto informed us) no acid, saltness.—Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 79.

Contentment is the chemic power
Which makes trees bloom in half an hour,
And faster plants substantial joy
Than axe or hatchet can destroy.
Blackmore. An Answer to an Epistle.

As the first [the geometricians] set have an eye on his Grace's lands, the chymists are not less taken with his buildings. They consider mortar as a very ante-diluvian invention in its present state: but properly employed, an admirable material for overturning establishments. They have found that the gunpowder of ruin is far the fittest for making other ruins, and so ad infinitum.
Burke. To a Noble Lord.

Those who have attempted much, have seldom failed to perform more than those who never deviate from the common roads of action: many valuable preparations of chymistry are supposed to have arisen from unsuccessful inquiries after the grand elixir.—Johnson. Adventurer, No. 101.

CI'CATRICE, or Ci'catrix. Ci'catrize. Cicatriza'tion. Cicatri'zing, n. } Fr. and It. Cicatrice. Scheïlius thinks it may be from Gr. Κικαειν, the reduplicate form of καειν, whence καιειν, urere. Martinius, from Cæco, because the cicatrix cæcat, that is, closes the open wound.

For which [wounds] I have prepared this treatise, as a soveraigne balme, to incarne and cicatrize them, not ulcerate or inflame them.—Prynne. On the Power of Parliaments. To the Reader, pt iii.

Jul. I can hear no more.
This opens an old wound and makes a new one.
Would it were cicatrized!
Massinger. The Guardian, Act I. sc 1.

It [the wild lettuce] healeth all maladies which the eies be subject unto, as namely, it riddeth away the cloudie webs therin, the cicatrices and scarres.
Holland. Plinie, b xx. c 7.

The first stage of healing, or the discharge of matter, is called digestion: the second, or filling up with flesh, incarnation: and the last, or skinning over, cicatrization.
Sharp. Surgery.

I left it to the neighbouring chirurgeon: the cicatrizing of these being for the most part the work of my surgeon.
Wiseman. Chirurgical Treatises, b. v. c. 9.

CI'CERONE. It. A name given to a Guide to works of art, ruins, or antiquity:—
Quasi as eloquent on these subjects as Cicero himself could have been.

And here let me recommend to the traveller, to explore, when travelling, every recess, and visit every object, without relying too much on the representations of others as the common guides are lazy and interested, ciceroni are often ignorant, and writers as often wrong, through want of opportunity, of knowledge, or of exertion, and not unfrequently from too great an attachment to their own systems.
Eustace. Italy, Prel Dis.

CICERONIANISM. An imitation or servile following of the style or phraseology of Cicero.

So you can speak and write Latin, not barbarously, I never require great study in ciceronianum, the chief abuse of Oxford, qui dum verba sectantur, res ipsas neglegunt.
Sir P. Sidney. To his brother Robert

For had an angel bin his discipliner, unless it were for dwelling too much upon ciceronianisms, and had chastiz'd the reading, not the vanity, it had bin plainly partial.
Milton. Areopagitica.

CI'CURATE, v. Ci'curation. } Lat. Cicur; (of uncertain etymology,) tame.
To tame, to train.

And therefore that even after carnal conversion, poysons may yet retain some portion of their natures, yet are they so refracted, cicurated, and subdued, as not to make good their first and destructive malignities.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. vii. c. 17.

Wild medicines grow here in abundance, and why may not tame ones flourish, if cicurated by art?—Fuller. Worthies. Kent.

This holds not only in domestick and mansuete birds, for then it might be thought the effect of cicuration or institution, but also in the wild; for my honour'd Friend Dr. Martin Lister informed me, that of his own knowledge one and the same swallow, by subtracting daily of her eggs, proceeded to lay nineteen successively, and then gave over.
Ray. On the Creation, pt i.

CI'DER. The Lat. Sicera; Gr. Σικερα, is rendered by Wickf—sydyr; the A. S. Version—beor; and the Modern Version—strong drink.

Fr. Cidre; It. Sicera; Sp. Cidra; Dut. and Ger. Seder; Sw. Cider. Goldast (in Wachter) thinks from the Heb. Sedar, to inebriate. The Dut. and Ger. Sieden, bullire, ebullire, to boil, to bubble, seems to present another etymology; since from the bubbling, sparkling nature of the liquor, the application of the term is sufficiently accounted for.

For he schal be gret bifore the Lord: and he schal not drinke wyn ne sydyr, and he schal be fulfild with the Holy Goost yet of his modir wombe.—Wickf. Luk, c. i.

Spic'd syllibubs, and cyder of the best;
And to the same down solemnly they sit.
Drayton, Eclogue 9.

Meanwhile (although the Mussic grape delights,
Pregnant of racy juice, and Formian hills
Temper thy cups, yet wilt not thou reject
Thy native liquors: lo! for thee my mill
Now grinds choice apples, and the British vats
O'erflow with generous cider.—J. Philips. Cider, b. i.

CIERGE. Fr. Cierge, which Cotgrave calls, A big waxe candle; Mr. Tyrwhitt,—wax-tapers.

The xl. thousand maidens dere
That beren in hevin her cierges clere.
Chaucer. Rom of the Rose.

CILIARY. Lat. Cilium, the lid of the eye. It is probable that cilia are so called because they continually move, (Cilient:—ciliare antiquis sit movere, Vossius.) Applied also to the hair of the eye-lid, or the eye-lash.

Therefore the ciliary processes or rather the ligaments observed in the inside of the sclerotick tunicles of the eye, by a late ingenious anatomist, do serve instead of a muscle, by their contraction to alter the figure of the eye, and make it broader.—Ray. On the Creation, pt. ii.

CILICIOUS. In Cilicia a cloth was manufactured of goats' hair, called cilicium. Hence, Cilicious—
Hairy.

Mark 1. It is said, he was,—as the vulgar translation, that of Beza, that of Sixtus Quintus, and Clement the eighth hath rendered it, Vestimentum habebat e pilis camelinis; which is as ours transmuteth it, a garment of camel's hair; that is, made of some texture of that hair, a course garment; a cilicious or sack cloth habit.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b v. c 15.

CIMETER. Fr. Cimeterre; Sp. Cimatarra. Cotgrave calls it "a scymitar or smyter; a kind of short and crooked sword, much in use among the Turks." Its crookedness consists in its being bent backwards. It is now more usually written scymitar, (qv.)

Their partisans are fine carved glass,
Fringed with the morning's spangled grass;
And pendant by their brawny thighs,
Hang cimeters of burnish'd ice.—Cotton. Winter.

CI'NCTURE, n. Lat. Cingere, cinctum, to gird. Any thing that girds, or surrounds, or encloses; a girdle, an enclosure.

Nor flower is so sweet,
In this large cincture,
But it upon her feet
Leaveth some tincture.—Drayton. Shepherd's Serena.

All Gods took pitie on him: onely he
That girds Earth in the cincture of the sea,
Divine Ulysses euer did enuie,
And made the fixt port of his birth to flie.
Chapman. Homer. Odyssey, b. i.

——— Such of late
Columbus found th' American so girt
With feathered cincture, naked else and wilde
Among the trees on isles and woodie shores.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. ix.

The next declining is, when Law becomes now too strait for the secular manners, and those too loose for the cincture of the Law.—Id. Tetrachordon.

And oft beneath the odorous shade
Of Chili's boundless forests laid,
She deigns to hear the savage youth repeat,
In loose numbers wildly sweet,
Their feather-cincture'd chiefs, and dusky loves.
Gray. The Progress of Poesy.

To Dwaraca's rich tow'rs the pilgrim sped
Though bashful penury his hope depress'd;
A tattered cincture was his only vest,
And o'er his weaker shoulder loosely spread,
Floated the mystic thread.—Jones. Hymn to Lacshmi.

CI'NDER. Fr. Cendre; It. Cenere, from Lat. Cinere, the ablative of Cinis, (Menage.) Vossius and after him Scheidius think from Κονις, which not only is applied to dust, but also to ashes; and is so called, perhaps, a levitate qua movetur, from Κιειν, κινειν, movere. But Skinner prefers the A. S. Sinder, which Somner interprets Sinders, dross, the scumme of metal tried by the fire. And Sinder, Skinner adds, is perhaps derived from A. S. Syndrian, to sunder, to separate; because the dross is separated from the metal, and is, as it were, ejus recrementum, seu potius secrementum. Hence cinders, reliquiæ carbonis exusti,—parum deflexo sensu. Feltham uses Cynder, as a verb.

The reliques or refuse of burned coal; of any thing burnt.

Was it not graunted me from spousals free,
Like to wilde beastes, to liue without offence
Without taste of such cares! Is there no fayth
Preseru'd to the cinders of Sichee!
Surrey. Virgile. Æneis, b. iv.

But that which better is for you, and more delliteth me,
To saue you from the sodeyne wast, vain cinders to be.
Uncert Auctors. Answ. to the Complaint of a Hot Lover, &c.

Ye heauenly spirits, whose ashie cinders lie
Vnder deepe ruins, with huge walls oppreast,
But not your praise, the which shall neuer die
Through your fair verses, nie in ashes rest,
Spenser. Ruins of Rome, s. 1.

——— Oft they assayd,
Hunger and thirst constraining, drudg'd as oft,
With hatefullest disrelish writh'd their jaws
With soot and cinders fill'd.—Milton. Paradise Lost, b x.

Untold griefs chouk, cinder the heart; and, by Restraint, their burning forces multiply
Feltham, pt. I. Resolve 36.

In the black form of cinder-wench she came,
When love, the hour, the place, had banish'd shame.
Gay. Trivia, b. iii.

Me oft has fancy ludicrous and wild
Sooth'd with a waking dream of houses, towers,
Trees, churches, and strange visages, expressed
In the red cinders, while with poring eye
I gazed, myself creating what I saw.—Cowper. Task, b iv.

CINE'REOUS. Cinera'tious. } Used in works of Natural History. Of an ashy colour; of an ashy substance. See Cinder.

The nerves arise from the glands of the cinerilious part of the brain, and are terminated in all parts of the body.
Cheyne.

Broken and burnt rocks, ruins of buildings, and cinerations earth.—Delany. Rev. Exam vol. ii. p. 226.

The hair is red at the tips, cinereous beneath.—Pennant.

CI'NNAMON. Gr. Κινναμωμον; Lat. Cinnamomum; Fr. Cinnamome; It. Cinnamomo; Sp. Cinnamomo. Vossius thinks so called, because it emits the odour of the Amomum.

What do ye honycomb, swete Alisoun?
My faire bird, my swete sinamome,
Awaketh, lemman min, and spekeith to me.
Chaucer. The Milleres Tale, v 3699.

Cinnamome or canamon groweth in Æthiopia.—As touching the plant that beareth cinnamon the tallest is not above two cubits high above ground, nor the lowest under one hand breadth or foure inches in compasse about foure fingers length, but it looketh as if it were dead and withered, whereas it is greene it yielded no smell at all.
Holland. Plinie, b. xii. c. 19.

The cinnamon tree of Ceylon; in whose parts there is a wonderful diversity; out of the root they get a sort of camphire, and its oil; out of the bark of the trunk, the true oil of cinnamon, from the leaves, an oil like that of cloves; out of the fruit a juniper oil, with a mixture of those of cinnamon and cloves, besides, they boil the berries into a sort of wax, out of which they make candles, plasters, unguents.—Ray. On the Creation, pt. ii.

CINQUE-PACE. Cinque-ports. } Fr. Cinque; Lat. Quinque, five.

Cinque-pace is the name of a dance, which Sir John Davies describes, and calls a Galliard: "a swift and wandering dance."

Five was the number of the musick's feet
Which still the dance did with five paces meet.
Davies. On Dancing.

For heare me, Hero, wooing, wedding, and repenting, is as a Scotch jigge, a measure and a cinque pace, the first suite is hot and hasty like a Scotch jigg (and full as fantasticall) the wedding mannerly modest, (as a measure) full of state and auncientry, and then comes repentance, and with his bad legs falls into the cinque-pace faster and faster, till he sinks into his grave.
Shakespeare. Much Ado about Nothing, Act II. sc. 1.

The Cinque ports, or five most important havens, as they formerly were esteemed in the kingdom, viz. Dover, Sandwich, Romney, Hastings, Hyde.—Blackstone. Com. b. III. c. 6.

CI'PHER, v. Ci'pher, n. Ci'pherhood. Ci'phering, n. } Fr. Chifrer; It. Cifera; Sp. Cifrar. Menage says—from the Hebrew.
To count, to reckon; to practise the rules of arithmetick. To practise calculation by figures. Also to write in fictitious characters; characters unknown to or concealed from others; and then—to characterise.

A cipher, (met.) is one of no value; no importance.

Barker was one of the Duke's secretaries, privy to his greatest affairs, the writer of his ciphers, the common carrier of ciphered and deciphered letters, the common conveyor and sender of his messages and letters between him and the Queen of Scots.—State Trials. Duke of Norfolk, an. 1571.

——— Let him know
No more than how to cipher well, or do
His tricks by the square root.
Massinger. The Guardian, Act I. sc. 1.

Eyes, hide my love and do not show
To any but to her my notes,
Who only doth that cipher know:
Wherewith we pass our secret thoughts.
Daniel. Song from Second Chorus.

Therefore God, to confute him, and to bring him to his native cypherhood, threatened to bring a sword against him and all his glory that should strip him of all his excellencies he valued himself by, and should slay him.
Goodwin. Works, vol. v. p. 443.

His father [Lord Clarendon] apprehending of what fatal consequences it would have been to the king's affairs, if his correspondence had been discovered by unfaithful secretaries, engaged him when very young to write all his letters to England in cipher; so that he was generally half the day writing in cypher or decyphering, and was so discreet, as well as faithful, that nothing was ever discovered by him.
Burnet. Own Time, an. 1667.

Yet he was kind, or, if severe in ought,
The love he bore to learning was in fault;
The village all declared how much he knew;
'Twas certain he could write and cypher too.
Goldsmith. Deserted Village.

Attend at councils which I must not weigh,
Do what they bid, and what they dictate say;
Enrob'd, and hoisted up into my chair,
Only to be a royal cipher there.—Churchill. Gotham, b. iii.

CIRC. } Lat. Circus; Fr. Cirque, a
CIRCE'NSIAN. } place in Rome, wherein the people sat to behold plays, games, and public exercises. Also applied, generally, to any space of a circular form. See CIRCLE.

He [Claudius] gave order that for his grandmother Livia, there should by decree be graunted divine honours; as also in the stately pompe of the Cirque solemnities, a chariot drawn with elephants, like unto that of Augustus: semblably; for the soules of his owne parents departed, dirges, and funerall feasts: and more than so, particularly in the honour of his father, Cirque-plaies and games every yeere upon his birth day: and in memoriall of his mother, a coach to be led and drawne along through the cirque: and the surname of Augusta, which by his grandmother was refused.
Holland. Suetonius, p. 158.

The poet says, that whiles the degenerating Romans had left one kind of baseness, they were fallen to another, a servile sloth: caring for no publick affairs, or the glory of their country; but, so they might have but victuals and pleasure, the pleasure of the Circensian shews, too basely they reckon d themselves in a happy case.
Holyday. Illust. of Juvenal, Sat. 10.

What injury did Neptune suffer, when he [Augustus] displaced his image in the Circensian games, because he had an ill voyage at sea.—Stillingfleet, vol. i. Ser. 10.

See the Cirque falls, th' unpillar'd temple nods,
Streets pav'd with heroes, Tyber choak'd with gods.
Till Peter's keys some christen'd Jove adorn,
And Pan to Moses lends his pagan horn.
Pope. Dunciad, b. iii.

Circs of the same sort [of rude stones] are still to be seen in Cornwall, so famous at this day for the athletic art.

CI'RCULING, n.

Fr. Cercle, circuler; It. Circolo, circolare; Sp. Circulo, circular; Lat. Circulus; Gr. Κυκλος; Lat. Circus; Gr. Κιρκος. Of uncertain origin. To circle, is—

To go round, to surround, to enclose, to encompass; to move round or about, so as to return to the point from which motion commenced. And thus (met.)—

To circulate, (sc.) a rumour, a report, is to carry it round or about, to spread it around or about; to disperse, to scatter.

The cercles of his eyen in his hed
They gloweden betwixen yelwe and red.
Chaucer. The Knightes Tale, v. 2133.

——— There as he slepte,
And efte with water, whiche she kepte.
She made a circle about hym thries,
And efte with fire of sulpher twies.—Gower. Con. A. b. v.

Whose heads forgrowen with pine, circled alway
With misty cloudes beaten with wind and storme.
Surrey. Virgile. Æneis, b. iv.

Wherefore in as moche as in an oratour is required to be a heape of all manner of lernynge, whiche of some is called the worlde of science, of other the circle of doctrine, whiche is in one worde of Greeke ENCYCLOPEDIA; therefore at this daye, may be founden but a very fewe oratours.
Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. i. c. 13.

About my necke a circulet, like the riche rubye.
Skelton. Speake Parrot.

By the grieuous complayntes of our liege subiects concerning traffiques, as it were circularwise too and fro both our dominions, we have often beene aduertised that in regard of diuers iniuries and damages, &c.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 159.

Thus, like Medea, sate she in her cell,
Which she had circled with her potent charmes,
From thence all hind'rance clearly to expel.
Drayton. The Baron's Wars, b. iii.

When Thirsil on a gentle rising hill
(Where all his flock he round might feeding view)
Sits down, and, circled with a lovely crew
Of nymphs and shepherd-boys, thus 'gan his song renew.
P. Fletcher. The Purple Island, c. 2.

Speak ye, who best can tell, ye sons of light
Angels, for ye behold him, and with songs
And choral symphonies, day without night,
Circle his throne rejoicing —Milton. Paradise Lost, b. v.

Lo! there th' unthankful swallow takes her rest,
And fills the tunnell with her circled nest.
Bp. Hall, Sat. 2.

Nor so begin, as did that circler late,
I sing a noble warre and Priam's fate.
What doth this promiser such gaping worth
Afford?
B. Jonson. Horace. Art of Poetrie.

"Royally clad," quoth he, "in cloth of gold,
As meetest may beseeme a noble mayd:
Her faire lockes in rich circlet be enrold,
A fayrer wight did neuer Sunne behold."
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. iii. c. 5.

Fairest of starrs, last in the train of night,
If better thou belong not to the dawn,
Sure pledge of day, that crownst the smiling morn
With thy bright circlet, praise him in thy sphere
While day arises, that sweet hour of prime.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. v.

——— And I had slaughter'd then
The two young boyes, Melanes, if their world circling sire,
(Great Neptune) had not saft their lives.
Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. xi.

Our God, when heaven and earth he did create,
Form'd man, who should of both participate;
If our lives' motions theirs must imitate,
Our knowledge, like our blood, must circulate.
Denham. The Progress of Learning.

Sun, stars, and all on earth it hurrieth
To each point of itself so far as 't circuleth.
And where it lighteth on advantages,
Its circulings grow sensible.
More. On the Soul, b. iii. c. 1.

Her virtues do, as to their proper sphere,
Return to dwell with you, of whom they were:
As perfect motions are all circular;
So they to you, their sea, whence less streames are.
Donne. To the Lady Bedford.

Which rule must serve for the better vnderstanding of that which Damascene hath touching crosse and circulatie speeches, wherein there are attributed to God such things as belong to manhood, and to man such as properly concerne the Deitie of Christ Jesus, the cause whereof is the association of natures in one subject.—Hooker. Eccles. Pol. b. v.

And he that challenged the boldest hand unto the picture of an echo, must laugh at this attempt, not only in the description of invisibility, but circumscription of ubiquity, and fetching under lines incomprehensible circularity.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. v. c. 21.

The Burien trophy is nineteen stones, circularly disposed, and in the middle, one much exceeding the rest in greatness.—Drayton. Poly-Olbion. Illustrations of Song 1.

——— Varnish'd with the ray
Of that clear light, with motion circuline,
Let turn about and stir up sounds divine,
That sweetly may affect th' attentive eare.
More. On the Soul, b. iii. c. 2.

There is no place of public resort, wherein I do not often make my appearance; sometimes I am seen thrusting my head into a round of politicians at Will's, and listening with great attention to the narratives that are made in those little circular audiences.—Spectator, No. 1.

We may also with S. Irenæus observe that Jesus in performing his cures, and other miraculous works, did never use any profane, silly, phantastick ceremonies; any such unaccountable methods or instruments, as magicians, diviners, circulatorious jugglers, and such emissaries of the Devil, or self-seeking impostours are wont to use.
Barrow, vol. ii. Ser. 20.

They wear but few cloaths; their heads are circled with a short turban, fringed or laced at both ends; it goes once about the head, and is tied in a knot, the laced ends hanging down.—Dampier. Voyages, an. 1686.

Besides, whatever battles may cost, the resources of men are so great in Germany, that they can never fail whilst Spain and Holland can furnish the money, or the several circles of the empire continue animated in the quarrel.
Sir William Temple. Letters.

The lungs of vipers, and other creatures (whose hearts and whose blood, even whilst it circulates, we have always found, as to sense, actually cold) may give us just occasion to enquire a little more warily, whether the great use of respiration be to cool the heart.—Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 69.

When we hear the sound of a bell or cannon a great way off, the tremulous vibrations of the air, like the circlings of the water, when a stone is flung into it, are from thence continually propagated to our ears or acoustick nerves, the undulations still growing the wider and the weaker, the farther they go.—Cudworth. Immutable Morality, p. 77.

Others argued for it; that the credit it would have must increase trade and the circulation of money at least in bank notes.—Burnet. Own Time, an. 1693.

It is in the nature of things, that they who are in the centre of a circle, should appear directly opposed to those, who view them from any part of the circumference.
Burke. Appeal from the New to the Old Whigs.

For when thy folding star arising shows
His paly circlet, at his warning lamp
The fragrant hours, and elves,
Who slept in buds the day,
And many a nymph who wreathes her brows with sedge,
And sheds the freshening dew, and lovelier still,
The pensive pleasures sweet,
Prepare thy shadowy car. Collins. Ode to Evening.

As every one is pleased with the imagining that he knows something not yet commonly divulged, secret history easily gains credit; but it is for the most part believed only while it circulates in whispers, and when once it is openly told, is openly confuted.—Rambler, No. 144.

They may want address to watch the hints, which conversation offers for the display of their particular attainments, or they may be so much unfurnished with matter on common subjects, that discourse not professedly literary glides over them as heterogeneous bodies, without admitting their conceptions to mix in the circulation.—Id. No. 14.

Borde's circulatory peregrinations in the quality of a quack-doctor, might have furnished more ample materials for an English topography.
Warton. History of English Poetry, vol. iii. p. 76.

CI'RCUIT, n.
CIRCUITE'ER.
CIRCU'ITION.
CIRCU'ITOUS.
CIRCU'ITOUSLY.
CIRCUR, v.

Fr. Circuir; It. Circuire; Sp. Circuir; Lat. Circuitus; Circumitus, from Circum, and itus, past part. of ire, to go around, to move round or about.

Circuit is applied especially to the portion of the kingdom round or about which the judges go, at certain periods, to perform certain official functions.

Circuitous is opposed to—direct, straight.

He then vysyted and circued his lande I ministryng iustyces to all persones.—Fabyan, vol. i. c. 34.

The fyre that brenneth in mount Ethna, doth not so great damage to them that dwell in Scicile, as one yl woman dooeth in the circuite of Rome.—Golden Boke, c. 36.

Yf we suffre to be assayled, it is of trouth this towne is grete in cyrcute and of small defence, it wyl be harde for vs to attende to euery place.
Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. ii. c. 52.

So the circuit or compasse of Ireland is 1800 miles, which is 200 lesse than Cæsar doth reckon or accompt.
Stow. A Description of England.

Whether the thieves condemned by any circuiter corrupted have done more villanies than their judge.
Whitelock. Manners of England, (1654,) p. 513.

If there be no injury that more exasperates than contempt, nor no contempt that more provokes than that which offends directly and immediately, (the affronters thereby proclaiming, that they are neither ashamed nor afraid of answering,) how provoking may we think that crime, which makes God the subject of our derision; and that with so little circuition, as to abuse that word, which he so solemnly declared his mind by to mankind.—Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 307.

But your circuit will at least procure you one of the greatest of temporal blessings, health. What an advantageous circumstance is it, for one that loves rambling so well, to be a grave and reputable rambler? While (like your fellow circuiteer, the sun) you travel the round of the earth, and behold all the iniquities under the heavens!
Pope. To Mr. ———. (On the Circuit.)

Upon this, the chief began to mutter something which I supposed was a prayer, and the two men, who carried the pigs, continued to walk round me all the time, making at least a dozen circuits before the other had finished his oration.—Cook. Voyage, vol. vi. b. iii. c. 11.

Citizens are in state of utter ignorance of the means by which they are to be fed, and they contribute little or nothing, except in an infinitely circuitous manner, to their own maintenance.—Burke. Thoughts &c. on Scarcity

With regard to Holland, and the ruling party there, I do not think it at all tainted, or likely to be so except by fear; or that it is likely to be misled, unless indirectly and circuitously.—Burke. Thoughts on French Affairs.

CIRCUMA'GITATE. Circum, and agitare, agitatum, to act frequently; from Agere, to drive.

To drive around with frequent and repeated motion; to shake, to whirl around.

But God who designed the heavens to be the causes of all changes and motions here below, hath placed his angels in their houses of light, and given to every one of his appointed officers a portion of the fiery matter to circumagitate and roll.—Bp. Taylor, vol. iii. Ser. 6.

CIRCUMA'MBIENT, adj. } Lat. Circumambire, pres. part. Circumambiens; from Circum, ambi, (Gr. Αμφι,) both signifying around, and ire, to go.
CIRCUMA'MBIENCY.
CIRCUM-A'MBULATE, v.

Going around, surrounding, encircling, encompassing.

Circum-ambulate,—Circum, and ambulate, (qv.)

What the instigation of Peristasie or circumambient inclosure can effect.
Bacon. On Learning, by G. Watts, b. iii. s. 4.

Ice receiveth its figure according unto the surface wherein it concreteth, or the circumambiency which conformeth it.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. ii. c. 1.

I shall only insist upon the excellent use of this noble circum-ambient companion of our globe, in respect of two of its meteors, the winds, and the clouds and rain.
Derham. Physico-Theology, b. i. c. 2.

Those that he employed for the geometrical part, were ordinary persons, that circumambulated with their box and needle, not knowing what they did; but our author [Petty] knew right well how to make use of their labours.
Wood. Athenæ Oxon.

Where should they fly? The circumambient heaven
Involv'd them still and every breeze was bane
Armstrong. The Art of Preserving Health, b. iv.

CIRCUMCEPT. Lat. Circum, around, and Captum, past part. of Capere, to take, to catch.

So that here we stande like shepe in a folde, circumcepted and cõpassed betwene our enemies and our doubtful frendes.
Hall. Rich. III. an. 3.

CIRCUMCISE, v. } Fr. Circoncir; It. Circoncidere; Sp. Circuncidar. Lat. Circumcidere; circum, and cædere, to cut around. Our old verb circumcide was formed immediately from the Latin present; its successor, circumcise, is formed from the past part.
CIRCUMCI'SER.
CIRCUMCI'SION.

(Met.) To admit to the covenant or faith.

Lo I Poul seie to ghou, that if ghe ben circumcidid Crist schal no thing profite to ghou. And I witnesse eftsoones to eche man that circumcidith himself, that he is dettour of all the lawe to be doon.—Wiclif. Galathies, c. 5.

Behold, I Paul say vnto you, that yf ye bee circumcised, Chryste shall profyte you nothynge at all. I testifie agayne to euery manne which is circumcysed that he is bound to kepe the whole lawe.—Bible, 1551. Ib.

For in Iesus Crist, neither circumcisioun is ony thing worth neither prepucie, but the bileue that worchith by charite.
Wiclif. Ib.

For in Jesu Chryste, neither is circumcision any thynge worth, neither yet vncircumcysion, but faythe which by loue is mighty in operacion.—Bible, 1551. Ib.

My name perhaps among the circumcis'd
In Dan, in Judah, and the bord'ring tribes
To all posterity may stand defam'd,
With malediction mention'd, and the blot
Of falshood most unconjugal traduct.
Milton. Samson Agonistes.

And Grotius adds, that this conciding punishment of circumcisers, became a penal law thereupon among the Visigoths.—Id. Of Civil Power in Ecclesiastical Causes.

—— So dy'd
Impenitent, and left a race behind
Like to themselves, distinguishable scarce
From Gentiles, but by circumcision vain,
And God with idols in their worship joyn'd.
Id. Paradise Regained, b. iii.

CIRCUMCURSA'TION. Lat. Circumcursare; from circum, and cursare, to run around, to run about.

A running around or about.

He allegeth the forementioned address of Felicissimus and Fortunatus to Pope Cornelius; the which was but a factious circumcursation of desperate wretches.
Barrow. Of the Pope's Supremacy.

CIRCUMDU'CT, v. } Lat. Circumducere, to lead around; from circum, and ductum, the past part. of ducere.
CIRCUMDU'CTION.

To lead round about, to lead or bring astray, to bring to nothing; and thus, in the civil law, to annul, to cancel.

Acts of judicature may be cancelled and circumducted by the will and direction of the judge, as also by the consent of the parties litigant, before the judge has pronounced and given sentence.—Ayliffe. Parergon.

Sayst thou so, Lucan? but thou scorn'st to stay
Under one title: thou hast made thy way
And flight above the isle, well near, by this
In thy admired Periegesis,
Or universal circumduction
Of all that read thy Poly-olbion.
B. Jonson. A Vision on the Muses of M. Drayton.

CIRCUMFERENCE, v. } Fr. Circonférence, It. Circonferenza; Sp. Circunferencia; Lat. Circumferre, to bear around; from circum, and ferens, the pres. part. of ferre, to bear. Montague uses the v. to circumfer.
CIRCU'MFERENCE, n.
CIRCUMFERE'NTIAL.

To bear, lead, move around, surround, encircle, encompass.

For then the charities which power hath circumferred to others doe all returne, and become her owne againe, in the perfection of charity.—Montague. Dev. Ess. Treat. 5. § 2.

But if you fondly passe our proffer'd offer,
'Tis not the rounder of your old fac'd walles,
Can hide you from our messengers of warre,
Though all the English, and their discipline
Were harbour'd in their rude circumference
Shakespeare. King John, Act ii. sc. 1.

O favourable spirit, propitious guest,
Well hast thou taught the way that might direct
Our knowledge, and the scale of nature set
From centre to circumference, whereon
In contemplation of created things,
By steps we may ascend to God.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. v.

Nor is the vigour of this great body included onely in itself, or circumferenced by its surface, but diffused at indeterminate distances through the air, water, and all bodies circumjacent.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. ii. c. 2.

If we believe and see, that the mind with ease, with pleasure, and without trouble, disposes and commands every motion and member, every muscle and nerve, every reserve and posture of our corporal frame: we may as well conceive, that infinite and incomprehensible spirit, may as easily dispose and order every particle and accident of this great and circumferential world.—Feltham, pt. ii. Resolve 71.

Whether we mean thereby [cosmos, the world] that one single vortex, to which our planetary earth belongs, or a system of as many vortices as we see fixed stars in the heavens, their central or circumferential planets moving round them respectively.
Cudworth. Immutable Morality, p. 171.

The skirt of your fashionable coats form as large a circumference as our petticoats; as these are set out with whalebone, so are those with wire, to encrease and sustain the bunch of fold that hangs down on each side: and the hat, I perceive, is decreased in just proportion to our head dresses.—Spectator, No. 145.

Whence it follows, that the best way to secure ourselves from thus perverting what is obscure in Scripture, is, first to render ourselves learned and stable in what is plain; and fixing that as our center, from whence we are not to be removed, we may extend our thoughts and opinions to what circumference we please.—Atterbury, vol. iii. Ser. 11.

At day-break, we discovered another island to the northward, which we judged to be about four miles in circumference.—Cook. Voyage, vol. i. b. i. c. 7.

CIRCUMFLEX, n. Fr. Circonflex; It. Circonflesso; Sp. Circumflexo; Lat. Circumflectere, to bend around; from circum and flexus, the past part. of flectere, to bend.

A bending (line).

The accents given to syllables, should have nothing to do with their measure, as short or long, but to denote their tune as grave or acute. And if accented with a circumflex, as both grave and acute, like the graces of some musical notes. And was, no doubt, the singing tone, which the native Greeks gave in their common talk to all such syllables. And is the reason why a circumflex must needs make a long syllable, a double note requiring a double time.
Grew. Cosmo. Sacra, b. ii. c. 6.

It was his sword tuck'd so high above his wast, and the circumflex, which persons of his profession take in their walking, made him appear at a distance wounded and falling.—Tatler, No. 7.

CIRCUMFLUENT. } Lat. Circumfluere, to flow around; from circum and fluere, to flow; pres. part. fluens, flowing.
CIRCU'MFLUOUS.

Flowing, floating, swimming around.

—— But the dignities
That decke a king, there are enough beside
In this circumfluous isle, that want no pride
To think them worthy of.—Chapman. Hom. Odyss. b. i.

—— For as earth, so he the world
Built on circumfluous waters calme, in wide
Crystallin ocean, and the loud misrule
Of Chaos farr remov'd.—Milton. Par. Lost, b. vii.

Matrons and men, raw youths and unripe maids;
And mighty heroes' more majestic shade;
And sons entomb'd before their parents face,
These the black waves of bounding Styx embrace,
Nine times circumfluent.
Buckinghamshire. Virgil. Georgic, b. iv.

Mentes my name: I rule the Taphian race
Whose bounds the deep circumfluent waves embrace.
Pope. Homer. Odyssey, b. i.

That chief, rejoin'd the God, his race derives
From Ithaca, and wondrous woes survives;
Laertes' son, girt with circumfluous tides,
He still calamitous constraint abides. Id. Ib. b. iv.

CIRCUMFORA'NEAN. } Lat. Circumforaneus; from circum, and forum, about the forum or market place.
CIRCUMFORA'NEOUS.

Going around the forum or market place;—any public place; vagrant, wandering.

Moreover, certain it is, that these jugglers and vagrant circumforaneous land-leapers, these practisers of lopier de main, these players at passe and repasse, with all the pack of vagabonds, ribauds, and jesters, who haunt the feasts of Cybele and Serapis, have greatly discredited and brought into obloquie the profession of poetry.—Holland. Plut. p. 978.

I mean those circumforaneous wits, whom every nation calls by the name of that dish of meat which it loves best. In Holland they are termed pickled herrings; in France, jean pottages; in Italy, macaronies, and in Great Britain, Jack puddings.—Spectator, No. 47.

CIRCUMFU'SE. } Lat. Circumfundere, to pour around; from circum, and fusus, the past part. of fundere, to pour.
CIRCUMFU'SION.
CIRCUMFU'SILE.

Poured around; spread or dispersed around.

And now, through circumfused light, she lookes
On nature's secrets there, as her owne books:
Speakes heaven's language! and discourseth free
To every order, ev'ry hierarchie!
B. Jonson. An Elegy on Lady Ann Pawlett.

Under whose conduct Michael soon reduced,
His armie, circumfus'd on either wing
Under their head imbodied all in one.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. vi.

Artist divine whose skilful hands infold
The victim's horn with circumfusile gold.
Pope. Homer. Odyssey, b. iii.

Others of these professors, though agreeing in the main system, were yet more refined upon certain branches of it; and held, that the soul was the outward, and the body the inward clothing: that the latter was extraduce, but the former of daily creation and circumfusion.
Swift. Tale of a Tub.

CIRCUMGESTA'TION. Lat. Circumgestare, to bear about; from circum, and gestare, (formed from gestus, the past part. of gerere,) to bear or carry.

A bearing or carrying around.

Circumgestation of the Eucharist to be adored, is named as one of the many things in which the Church of Rome hath greatly turned aside from the doctrines of the Scripture, &c.—Bp. Taylor. Dissuasive from Popery, pt. i. s. 9.

CIRCU'MGYRATE, v. } Fr. Circongirer; Lat. from circum, and gyrus; Gr. Γυρος, from γυρ-ειν, incurvare, to bend, or arch.
CIRCUMGYRA'TION.
CIRCUMGY'RE.

To move round; to perform a rotatory or circular motion.

The soul about itself circumgyrates
Her various forms, and what she most doth love
She oft before herself stabilitates.
More. On the Soul, Poem 2. b. i. c. 2. s. 43.

For like as the turnings of bodies, which together with a circular motion, fall downward, are not firm and strong, but turning as they do round by force, and tending downward by nature, there is made of them both, a certain turbulent and irregular circumgyration.—Holland. Plutarch, p. 975.

A sweet river, which after twenty little miles circumgyring, or playing to and fro, discharges itself into the ocean.

Sir T. Herbert. Travels, p. 43.

Since that philosopher seems the rather to make the earth an animal and a God, because of its diurnal circumagitation upon its own axes, we may conclude that afterwards when in his old age, (as Plutarch records from Theophrastus) he gave entertainment also to that other part of the Pythagorick hypothesis, and attributed to the earth a planetary annual motion likewise about the sun.

Cudworth. Intellectual System, p. 235.

CIRCUMJA'CENT. Fr. Circonjacent; Lat. Circumjacere, to lie round about; from circum, and jacens, the pres. part. of jacere, to lie.

Lying, situate around.

When wood and many other bodies do petrifie either by the sea, other waters, or earths abounding in such spirits, we do not usually ascribe their induration to cold, but rather unto saltnous spirits, concretive juices, and cases circumjacent, which do assimilate all bodies, not prepared for their impressions.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. ii. c. 1.

Be this understood of the continual part of this shore, which otherwise hath wasted and shaven out of from the whole earth, and surrounded with the circumjacent countries, even some in Oxfordshire destroyed, by Gloucestershire interposed.—Fuller. Worthies. Worcestershire.

The partition of Poland offered an object of spoil, in which the parties might agree: they were circumjacent, and each might take a portion convenient to his own territory.

Burke. On a Regicide Peace, Let. 2.

CIRCUMJO'VIAL. The satellites or moons, which attend around the planet Jupiter.

This is well known among the circumjovials for instance, that they all have a slow and gradual progress first towards one, then back again towards the other pole of Jupiter.

Derham. Astro. Theol. b. iv. c. 5.

CIRCUMLOCU'TION. } Fr. Circonlocution; CIRCUMLO'CUTORY. } It. Circonlocuzione; Sp. Circunlocucion; Lat. Circumloqui, to speak around, circuitously, not straight forward, direct to the purpose; from circum, and locutus, past part. of loqui, to speak. Circumlocution, old G. Douglas calls—aboutspeach.

A circuitous speech or expression. See the quotation from Wilson.

Circumlocution is a large description, either to set forth a thing more gorgeously or els to hide it, if the eares can not beare the open speaking; or, when with fewe words we cannot open our meaninge, to speake it more largely.

Wilson. The Arte of Rhetorique, p. 178.

I thoughte it rather better to seke the edification of the playne vnlearned by playne ternyng of wordes, than by tedious circumlocution to make a paraphrase vpon paraphrase.—Udal. Prologue to Ephesians.

Indeed that most general one [proposition] what is, is, may serve sometimes to show a man the absurdity he is guilty of, when by circumlocution, or equivocal terms, he would in particular instances, deny the same thing of itself; because no body will so openly bid defiance to common sense, as to affirm visible and direct contradictions in plain words, or if he does, a man is excused, if he breaks off any further discourse with him.—Locke. On Underst. b. iv. c. 7.

Periphrase is another great aid to prolixity: being a diffused circumlocutory manner of expressing a known idea, which should be so mysteriously couched, as to give the reader the pleasure of guessing what it is, that the author can possibly mean, and a strange surprise when he finds it.

Pope. Martinus Scriblerus, c. 8.

The whole compass of the language is tried to find synonimes and circumlocutions for massacre and murder. Things are never called by their common names. Massacre is sometimes agitation, sometimes effervescence, sometimes excess, sometimes too continued an exercise of revolutionary power.

Burke. Pref. to M. Brissot's Address to his Constituents.

CIRCUMMU'RE. Lat. Circum, and murus, or marus, a walk. See IMMURE.

As used by Shakespeare it is equivalent to—walled around, surrounded by a wall.

Isab. He hath a garden circummur'd with bricke,
Whose western side is with a vineyard back't.

Shakespeare. Measure for Measure, Act iv. sc. 1.

CIRCUMNA'VIGATE. } Lat, Circum, and CIRCUMNAVIGA'BLE. } navigare, i. e. navem CIRCUMNAVIGA'TION. } agere. Navis, Gr. CIRCUMNA'VIGATOR. } Naus, that which floats or swims, from ναειν, to float or swim.

To go round in a floating vessel, in a ship; to sail around; or, as Warner expresses it, to circumsail, (qv.)

Thus having circumnavigated the whole earth, let the ship no longer be termed the Desire, but the Performance. He [Cavendish] was the third man, and second Englishman of such universal undertakings.—Fuller. Worthies. Suffolk.

Of how infinite advantage it hath been to these two or three last ages,—the resolving experimentally those ancient problems of the spherical roundness of the earth, of the being of antipodes, of the habitableness of the torrid zone, and the rendering the whole terraqueous globe circumnavigable, do abundantly demonstrate.—Ray. On the Creation, pt. i.

His [Magalhaens] ship, called the Victory, was the first that circumnavigated the globe, and the only one of his squadron that surmounted the dangers and distresses which attended his heroic enterprise.

Cook. Introd. to Second Voyage, vol. iii.

His [Howard's] plan is original: and it is as full of genius as it is of humanity. It was a voyage of discovery, a circumnavigation of charity.

Burke. Speech at Bristol previous to the Election.

They [the Spaniards] were the second nation that dared the extent of the Pacific Ocean, and the second circumnavigators of the globe.—Johnson. Falkland Islands.

CIRCUMPLE'XION. Lat. Circumplecti, to fold around, to enfold or embrace; from circum, and plexus, the past part. of plectere, (Gr. πλεκ-ειν,) to knit together, to connect, to clasp, to embrace.

I wot not what circumplexions and environments.

Holland. Plutarch, p. 827.

'Tis true it was after his fall, but before he was turned out of Paradise, that he made himself his fig-leaf circumplexion, which, being rough and fretting, was but a kind of gentler curricomb.—Feltham, pt. ii. Resolve 53.

CIRCUMPOSI'TION. Lat. Circumponere, to put or place around or about; circum, and positus, the past part. of ponere, to place or put.

A placing or putting round or about.

Now is your time for circumposition by tubs or baskets of earth, and for laying of branches to take root.

Evelyn. Kalendarium, February.

We see that the water may be easily deprived of its fluidity by the circumposition of snow and salt, and reduced to be fluid again by the sun.—Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 599.

CIRCUMROTA'TION. } Lat. Circum, and CIRCUMROTA'TORY. } rota, a wheel; which Vossius thinks is from Ῥοθεω, cum impetu ferri, to be forced along; to be whirled about.

A wheeling around.

The power of agitation upon the spirits is well known; every man has felt his heart lightened in a rapid vehicle, or on a galloping horse: and nothing is plainer than that he who towers to the fifth story, is whirled through more space by every circumrotation, than another that grovels upon the ground-floor.—Rambler, No. 117.

A great many tunes, by a variety of circumrotatory flourishes, put one in mind of a lark's descent to the ground.

Shenstone.

CIRCUMSA'ILED. Compounded of the Lat. Circum, and Eng. Sail.

To sail around, to circumnavigate.

But, moderns, yee (of whom are some
Have circum sail'd the earth)
Here pardon vs your sailes, and glue
Your proper praises bearth.

Warner. Albion's England, b. xi. c. 63.

CI'RCUMSCRIBE, v. } Fr. Circonscrire; CIRCUMSCRI'PTION. } It. Circoscrivere; Sp. CIRCUMSCRI'PTIVE. } Circunscribir; Lat. CIRCUMSCRI'PTIVELY. } Circumscribere, to grave around; from circum, and scribere, which Vossius thinks is from Γραφ-ειν, to grave.

To grave, or write around, (sc.) certain lines, limits, or bounds; and thus, to limit or bound, to confine.

For God is as myghtie in the stable as in the tẽple. And as he is not comprehensyble nor circumscribed no where, so is he present euery where.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 121.

And where the one natiuitie and eke the other can not be in worde expressed, whether it be his eternall generatiõ of his father, whiche from euer was withoute circumscription of tyme, or that, &c.—Udal. Acts, c. 8.

Geat. How is the bodie of Christ in heauen, and how is the sacrament, whether circumscriptiuely or definitively?

Glen. The bodie of Christ is in heauen circumscriptiuelie, but not so in the sacrament.

Fox. Martyrs. A Disp. about the Sacrament, an. 1549.

Ar. They that before like gnats playd in his beames,
And throng'd to circumscribe him, now not see!
Nor deigne to hold a common seat with him.

B. Jonson. Sejanus, Act v.

Then staid the fervid wheels, and in his hand
He took the golden compasses prepar'd
In God's eternal store, to circumscribe
This universe, and all created things.

Milton. Paradise Lost, b. vii.

For the circumscription of a thing is nothing else but the determination or damming of its place, and so both the termes of distinction are the same.

More. Immortality of the Soul, b. i. c. 10.

In so much as Cyril can say, if the Deitie itselfe were capable of partition, it must be a bodie, and if it were a bodie, it must needs be in a place, and have quantitie and magnitude, and, thereupon, should not auoid circumscription.—Bp Hall. The Old Religion, pt. ii. s. 3.

When God speaks by his prophet, he never speaks in the first person, thereby signifying his Majesty and Omnipresence. He would have said, I hate putting away, saith the Lord; and not sent word by Malachi in a sudden fall in stile, The Lord God saith that he hateth putting away, that were a phrase to shrink the glorious Omnipresence of God speaking into a kind of circumscripture absence.

Milton. Tetrachordon.

These words, taken circumscriptly, without regard to any precedent law of Moses, or attestation of Christ himself, or without care to preserve those his fundamental and superior laws of nature and charity, to which all other ordinances give up their seals, are as much against plain equity and the mercy of religion as those words of Take, eat, this is my body, elementally understood, are against nature and sense.

Id. Doctrine of Divorce.

Nor were those blustering brethren left at large,
On seas and shores their fury to discharge:
Bound as they are, and circumscribed, in place,
They rend the world, resistless, where they pass.

Dryden. Ovid Metam. b. i.

However, if it be the office of those who are thus circumstanced, to take a decided part, it is no less their duty that it should be a sober one. It ought to be circumscribed by the same laws of decorum, and balanced by the same temper, which bound and regulate all the virtues.

Burke. Observations on a late State of the Nation.

If the spectator can be once persuaded that this old acquaintance are Alexander and Cæsar, that a room illuminated with candles is the plain of Pharsalia, or the banks of Granicus, he is in a state of elevation above the reach of reason, or of truth, and from the heights of empyrean poetry may despise the circumscriptions of terrestrial nature.

Johnson. Preface to Shakespeare.

CIRCUMSPE'CT. } Fr. Circonspection; CIRCUMSPE'CTION. } It. Circospetto, circospezione; Sp. Circunspecto; CIRCUMSPE'CTIVE. } Lat. Circumspicere, to CIRCUMSPE'CTIVELY. } look around; from circum and spectus, the past CIRCUMSPE'CTLY. } part. of specere, to see, CIRCUMSPE'CTNESS. } to look. CIRCUMSPE'CTIVE. }

To look around; to search around; and thus to examine, or observe, carefully, cautiously; to be watchful, vigilant, attentive. See the extract from Sir T. Elyot.

He is lyke to a prouydent and circumspect buylder, that buildeth his house not for a vaine braggue or shewe one yere, nor to serue hym for a short while and no longer, but for a firmenesse and stedfastnesse to stande and endure without perysshyng agaynste any blousterous storme or tempeste to come.—Udal. Luke, c. 6.

Why should they dispayre eyther of theyr own prowesse or his circumspectnes.—Goldyng. Cæsar, p. 31.

And that may be welle called circumspection, whiche sygnyfieth as moche, as beholdynge on euery part, what is well and sufficiente, what lacketh, howe, and from whens it may be prouided.—Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. i. c. 23.

And this man vseth hymselfe in thys place therefore, verye circumspectlye for this poynt in this chapiter, whei he speaketh of heretikes after his fill. sortes of folke before.

Sir T. More. Workes, p. 941.

But I have learned that the body of Christ is in the sacrament, but not locallie nor circumspectiuelie, but after an vnspeakeable maner vnknowne to man.

Fox. Martyrs. A Disput. about the Sacrament, an. 1549.

His swelling blood exhales, and therefore hear
What gives my temperate brother cause to use
His readiest circumspection, and consult
For remedy against all his wicked purposes.

Beaum. & Fletch. The Bloody Brother, Act iii. sc. 1.

So all ere day-spring, under conscious night
Secret they finish'd, and in order set,
With silent circumspection unespi'd.

Milton. Paradise Lost, b. vi.

She so maturely and circumspectly opposed herself against the hostile designs of them and others, that from this time she was to her friends an admiration, and a terrour to her foes.—Camden. Elizab. an. 1. 9.

Travel is reputed a proper means to create men wise, and a possible to make them honest, because it forces circumspectness on those abroad, who at home are nursed in security.
Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 90.

How can man think to act his ill unseen, when God shall, like the air, be circumspicuous round about him? it is not possible that such a Majesty should either not defend the innocent, or permit an ill unpunished.—Feltham, pt. i. Res 98.

However it happened, I found it agreed by all the most diligent and circumspect inquiries I could make, that in the years sixty-nine and seventy there was hardly any foreign trade among them, besides that of the Indies, by which the traders made the returns of their money without loss.
Sir W. Temple. On the United Provinces, c. 7.

Not one looks backward, onward still he goes,
Yet ne'er looks forward further than his nose.
Nor less alike the politic and wise:
All sly, slow things, with circumspective eyes,
Men in their loose unguarded hours they take,
Not that themselves are wise, but others weak.
Pope. Essay on Man, Ep. 4.

Now their authority weighs more with me, than the general vogue, or the concurrent suffrages of a thousand others who never examined the thing so carefully and circumspectly as they have done, but run away with the cry of the common herd of philosophers.—Ray. On the Creation, pt. ii.

Being at a great loss what conclusions to draw from this unaccountable behaviour, we continued our march toward the ostrog, with great circumspection, and when we had arrived within a quarter of a mile of it, we perceived a body of armed men marching toward us.
Cook. Voyages, vol. vii. b. vi. c. 1.

But let us try to clear our clouded brows,
And tell the horrid tale with cheerful face;
The stormy Sultan rages at our stay.
Frame your report with circumspective art.
Johnson. Irene, Act vi. sc. 10.

Then judge yourself and prove your man
As circumspectly as you can,
And, having made election,
Beware no negligence of yours,
Such as a friend but ill endures,
Infeeble his affection.—Cowper. Friendship.

CIRCUMSTANCE, v. Cı'RCUMSTANCE, n. Cı'RCUMSTANT, adj. CIRCUMSTA'NTIAL, adj. CIRCUMSTA'NTIAL, n. CIRCUMSTA'NTIALLY. CIRCUMSTA'NTIATE, v. CIRCUMSTA'NTIATE, adj. Cı'RCUMSTANTLY. } Fr. Circonstance; It. Circostanza; Sp. Circunstancia; Lat. Circumstare, to stand around; from Circum, and stans, the pres. part. of stare, to stand.

It is applied,—individually,—to any thing surrounding, or in any manner attending, accompanying, or connected with the main fact; collectively, in the plural, to the whole state, situation or condition of affairs, as formed, constituted, or composed by various separate particulars; the particulars. And—

To circumstance, and circumstantiate, are to cause to be, to put or place in such state, situation, or condition; to assure or confirm by circumstances.

Circumstantial is applied by Milton to men attentive to circumstances, to minute particulars.

Whan the orison was don of Palamon,
His sacrifice he did, and that anon,
Fulle pitously, with alle circumstances,
All teil I not as now his observances.
Chaucer. The Knyghtes Tale, v. 2202.

One Scripture will helpe to declare another. And the circumstances, that is to say, the places that go before and after, wil geue light vnto the midle text
Tyndall. Workes, p 142.

A gentylman, bareheaded, & set on knees, with a knife prepared properly to that use, also with certain jestures, cuttes a sunder certaine partes of the wild beast in a certain order very circumstantly.—Chaloner. Prayse of Folie, (1577.)

You have refin'd me, and to worthiest things,
Virtue, art, beauty, fortune, now I see
Rareness, or use, not nature, value brings;
And such, as they are circumstanc'd, they be.
Donne. To the Countess of Bedford.

Bian. 'Tis very good; I must be circumstanc'd.
Shakespeare. Othello, Act iii. sc. 4.

Which words being both noted and taken grievously that hee should so discourage the souldiers, hee was taken and carried to Skinke, who without any circumstances condemned him to be thrown off the great steeple of the towne into the Reine, which was accomplished.
Stow. Queen Elizabeth, an. 1586.

Man. No preface needs, thou seest we long to know.
Mess. It would burst forth, but I recover breath
And sense distract, to know well what I utter.
Man. Tell us the sum, the circumstance defer.
Milton. Samson Agonistes.

May it not be, for that the ayr of rivers being always gross and heavy, in winter is more inspissate by reason of the circumstant cold, and so is an hindrance to the course of ships.—Holland. Plutarch, p. 523.

——— This fierce abridgment,
Hath to it circumstantiall branches, which Distinction should be rich in.
Shakespeare. Cymbeline, Act v. sc. 5.

[This] induces me to be of opinion, that every worthy man in parliament, for the word baron imports no more, might for the public good be thought a fit peer and judge of the king, without regard had to petty caveats and circumstances, the chief impediment in high affairs, and ever stood upon most by circumstantial men.
Milton. The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates.

This probleme in Christian Philosophy is yet more intelligible, and will be reduced to certain experience, if we consider good life in union and concretion, with particular, material, and circumstantiate actions of piety.
Bp. Taylor. Great Exemplar, pt. iii. Disc. 15.

My Lord Chancellor, I have (informative only) hinted a little at the main things which I am often charged with, my memory cannot fully reach all, neither will time permit to circumstantiate these particulars, which I have only touched in the general.—State Trials. Marquis of Argyle, an. 1661.

And in case circumstances should so conspire, as that youth and quality should be attended by such a plentiful fortune, as that after all, that either justice, prudence, or decency can challenge, there remains yet enough both to relieve the poor, and purchase rarities themselves; I will not be so severe as to condemn persons so circumstanced, nor fall out with those that are able to reconcile sumptuousness and charity.—Boyle. Occasional Reflections, s. 5. Ref. 9.

At the first exuction, which could not be supposed to have well emptied the internal glass, this vessel was, by a pressure of the superior air upon the circumstant water, broken into I know not how many pieces.
Id. Works, vol. iii. p. 640.

We must therefore distinguish between the essentials in religious worship, and external accidents that cloath it, between what enters the nature of the action, and what is merely circumstantial.—Sharp, vol. viii. Ser. 10.

And so we say, as to the fourth, the bodily rest that is there enjoined, and the precise day to which the commandment hath respect are by no means of the essence or substance of the commandment; but are to be accounted circumstantials added to it, the better to accommodate it to the state of the Jewish church that then was.
Id. Ib. vol. iv. Ser. 13.

I conceived myself obliged to set down somewhat circumstantially not only the events but the manner of my trials.
Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 470.

If ever there was a subordinate dominion pleasantly circumstanced to the superior power, it was this; a large rent or tribute, to the amount of 260,000*l.* a year, was paid in monthly instalments with the punctuality of a dividend at the Bank.—Burke. Speech on Mr. Fox's East India Bill.

We are now at the close of our review of the three simple forms of artificial society, and we have shown them, however they may differ in name, or in some slight circumstances, to be all alike in effect; in effect to be all tyrannies.
Id. A Vindication of Natural Society.

I shall now give a more full and circumstantial description of each, in which, if some things should happen to be repeated, the greater part will be found new.
Cook. Voyage, vol. ii. b. iii. c. 6.

CIRCUMTERRA'NEOUS. Lat. Circum, and terra, the earth.
Being or dwelling around the earth.

Celsus writes:—We ought to give credit to wise men, who affirm that most of these lower and circumterraneous demons delight in geniture, blood, &c. And Origen agrees with him.—Hollywell. Melamp. p. 101.

CIRCUMVALLA'TION. It. Circonvallazione; Sp. Circunvalacion; Lat. Circumvallare, to surround with a vallum, i.e. with a fortification, composed ex vallis, of stakes. Applied generally to—

The fortifications thrown around any place.

Buckingham fails to circumvallation, ordering the ships to encompass the island without, to hinder all provision and supply from Toiras.—Baker. Charles I. an. 1627.

The confederates, since the approach of the enemy, have added several new redoubts to their camp, and drawn the cannon out of the lines of circumvallation in a readiness for the batteries.—Tatler, No. 175.

CIRCUMVE'NT, v. CIRCUMVE'NTER. CIRCUMVE'NTION. CIRCUMVENTING, n. } Fr. Circonvenir; It. Circonvenire; Lat. Circumvenire, to come around; from circum, and ventus, the past part. of venire, to come.

To come around, (sc.) either by fraud or force; now used in general with a subaudition of fraud; and thus to—

Circumvent is—to surround or encompass with snares; to deceive, to delude, to cheat.

To come around any one, is still used in vulgar speech.

That subtill fraudelent foxe Antiochus craftely circumvented Egipte & Judeam.—Joye. Daniel c. 8.

Now because I had once submitted myselfe to the Vicechauncelour, and I was thereby circumuented: therefore, I thought I would not now bee so hasty in submitting myself.
Barnes. Works, p. 232.

Nevertheless your Majesty now of late hath found, and tried by a large number of witnesses, the said Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Essex, contrary to the singular trust and confidence which your Majesty had in him, to be the most false and corrupt traitour, deceiver, and circumventor against your most royal person, and the imperial crowne of this your realm.—Burnett. Records, b. iii. No. 18. Attainder of T. Cromwell.

She set upon me with the smoothest speech
That court and age could cunningly devise;
Th' one authentic, made her ht to teach,
The other learn'd her how to subtilize
Both were enough to circumvent the wise.
Daniel. The Complaint of Rosamond.

——— And somewhere nigh at hand;
Watches no doubt with greedy hope to find
His wish and best advantage, us asunder,
Hopeless to circumvent us joynd.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. ix.

What euer haue bin thought on in this state
That could be brought to bodily act ere Rome
Had circumuention.—Shakespeare. Coriolanus, Act I. sc 2.

They sit in the seat of judgment, but go seldom by the rule of right, neglecting and proudly overlooking the modest and harmless, but condemning the audacious, though guilty of abominable crimes, they still their prisons, but with men committed rather by circumvention than any just cause.—Milton. History of England, b. iii.

The secretary would not easily give way to any circumventing and unfair dealings with him.
Camden. Elizabeth, an. 1600.

'Twas harder yet to move the mother's mind,
And to this heavy task was I design'd:
Lessons against her love I knew were vain:
I circumvented whom I could not gain.
Dryden. Ovid. Metam. b. xiii.

Cunning is only the want of understanding; which, because it cannot compass its ends by direct ways, would do it by a trick, and circumvention.
Locke. Of Education, c. 140.

He then found that one Bush had persuaded the Earl that a clergyman was not a proper secretary, and had obtained the office for himself. In a man like Swift, such circumvention and inconstancy must have excited violent indignation.—Johnson. Life of Swift.

CIRCUMVE'RSION. Lat. Circumvertere; To turn around, or about.

For these are the ascensions of divers circles, the circumversions and turnings about, habitudes in references one to another, yea, and respective to us, which make most elegantly those orderly elevations and depressions in altitude, which appear in her [the Moon's] motion, yea, and her digressions in latitude, all jointly with that ordinary and direct revolution of hers in longitude.—Holland. Plutarch, p. 901.

CIRCUMVE'ST. Lat. Circumvestire; To clothe around.

For I would not be ignorant by long observation, both abroad and at home; that every where all greatness of power and favour is circumvested with much prejudice.
Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 207.

Who on this base the earth didst firmly found,
And mad'st the deep to circumvest it round.
Id. Psalm 104

CIRCUMVO'LVE. CIRCUMVOLU'TION. } Fr. Circonvolution; It. Circonvoluzione; Lat. Circumvolvere; To roll around.

So that when e're we circumvolve our eyes;
Such rich, such fresh, such sweet varieties,
Ravish our spirits, that entranc't we see
None writes love's passion in the world like thee.
R. Herrick. On Fletcher's Incomparable Plays.

In the motion of thine heaven, though some starres have their owne peculiar, and contrary courses, yet all yield themselves to the sway of the main circumvolution of that first mover; so though I have a will of mine owne, yet let me give myself over to be ruled, and ordered by thy Spirit in all my wayes.—Bp. Hall. Meditation upon the Heavens moving.

CI'STERN. A cistá est cisterna, says Vossius. Fr. Cestern. The Lat. Cista; Gr. Κιστη, so called a cavitate, quâ veluti surgit, from Κι-ειν, movere in ambitum, to move in a circuit, (Lennep.)

Any thing hollow; (sc.) to receive and contain water or other liquid.

And he that first cam doun into the cisterne, after the mouynge of the water, was maad hool of what euer syknesse he was houldun.—Wiclif. John, c. 5.

Howbeit, for to keep good and cleare water, it were the better way to have alwaies two cisterns together, that in the former the water may settle and cast doun all the grounds to the bottome, and so the cleare water onely pass into the other, as if it were strained through a fine colandre.

Holland. Plinie, b. xxxvi. c. 23.

——— Neare which, were cisterns made,
All pav'd, and cleare, where Troian wives, and their faire daughters had Laundrie for their fine linnen weeds, in times of cleanly peace.—Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. xxii.

Each gushing font a marble cistern fills,
Whose polish'd bed receives the falling rills;
Where Trojan dames (ere yet alarmed by Greece)
Wash'd their fair garments in the days of Peace.

Pope. Ib.

Here blended swells with interfering rills;
And here the lake's capacious cistern fills.

Brooke. Universal Beauty, b. ii.

Before their merriment is at an end, I am sick with disgust, and, perhaps, reproached with my sobriety, or by some sly insinuations insulted as a cit.

Johnson. Adventurer, No. 106.

CI'TADEL. Fr. Citadelle; It. Citadella, from Citade. Menage deduces it from Civitas. (See CITY.) Cotgrave says—

A strong fort or castle, that serves both to defend and to curb a city.

They (the bees) among fresh dews and flowers
Fly to and fro, or on the smoothed plank,
The suburb of their straw-built cittadel,
Now rub'd with baum, expatiate and confer
Their state affairs. Milton. Paradise Lost, b. i.

Cromwell built three citadels, at Leith, Ayr, and Inverness, besides many little forts.—Burnet. Own Time, b. i.

I now recollect, British corn is there also taxed up to ten per cent. and this too in the very head quarters, the very citadel of smuggling, the Isle of Man.

Chaucer. The Knightes Tale, v. 1961.

He taught hir, till she was certeyne
Of harpe, citole, and of note,
With many a tewne, and many a note,
Vpon musike, vpon measure.—Gower. Con. A. b. viii.

For olde men, which sowned lowe
With harpe, and lute, and with citole,
The houe daunce, and the carole,
In suche a wise as loue hath bede,
A softe pase thei daunce and trede,
And with the women otherwhile
With sobre chere awonge thei smile.—Id. Ib.

Citizen,—It. Cittadino; Sp. Ciudadano; Fr. Citoyen.

An inhabitant of a city; one who dwells or inhabits in a city; one who possesses or enjoys certain privileges of a city; a freeman of a city; one who follows, pursues, or practises the trades or businesses of a city;—as opposed to those who do not.

For the legal application of the name city, see the quotation from Blackstone.

City is very much used, prefixed.

Stanihurst (Description of Ireland, c. 1.) affects to write cuitie; and Fuller, city-nesse, as distinguished from church, (Devonshire.)

Thei toke his handes betwene theirs, and if they felt theim softe and smothe, forthwith as an ydell vacabunde man they dispatched and sent him awaie: and if thei found his handes harde and ful of hard knottes, by and by they admitted hym a citesen and dweller in Rome.—Golden Boke, c. 25.

I do but return to that best and blessed city to which all her citizens (by the condition of death) shall repair. Therein is the only God, the most high and chief prince, who filleth or feedeth his citizens with a sweetness more than marvellous: in regard whereof this being, which others call a life, is rather to be accounted a death than a life.

Raleigh. History of the World, b. ii. c. 6. s. 6.

Whereas the hermit leads a sweet retired life,
From villages replete with ragg'd and sweating clowns
And from the loathsome airs of smoky cited towns.

Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 13.

Amphion was virtuous, wise, and eloquent; and by his prudence and sweete oratory, he brought sauage people vnto ciuility, and taught the ignorant knowledge, making them liue together in cities conformable vnto humaine lawes.—Stow. Memorable Antiquities, p. 19.

Imo. So sicke I am not, yet I am not well:
But not so citizen a wanton, as
To seeme to dye, ere sicke.

Shakespeare. Cymbeline, Act iv. sc. 2.

And I assure you, although no bred courtling, yet a most particular man, of goodly havings, well fashion'd 'haviour, and of as hard'ned and excellent a barke, as the most naturally-qualified amongst them, inform'd, reform'd, and transform'd, from his originall citycisme.

B. Jonson. Cynthia's Revels, Act v. sc. 4.

Though they are in the world, they are not of it, as a citizen of one city may live in another, and yet not be free of it, nor properly of it, but a mere stranger and a foreigner, as much as if he was not there, so the saints of the most high God, whilst they are in this world, they are only strangers and sojourners in it: the city which they belong to, and of which they are fellow-citizens, is above, quite out of sight to the men of this world.

Bp. Beveridge, vol. i. Ser. 48.

They, taking it otherwise, and refusing the good, through an implanted evil disposition, and always prone to mischief, have not only rejected the citizenship, as dishonourable, but also abhor both openly and secretly, the few among them who are well affected to us.

Bp. Wilson. Bible, 3 Maccab. iii. 16.

A city is a town incorporated, which is or has been the see of a bishop; and though the bishopricke has been dissolved, as at Westminster, yet still it remaineth a city.

Blackstone. Commentaries, Introd. § 4.

Our citizenship, as saith the apostle, is in heaven.

Bp. Horne. Occasional Sermons, p. 158.

CI'TRINE. } Of the colour of the citron,
CITRINA'TION. } or "a deep yellowe colour."

Citrinatione you do not expounde, being a terme of alchymie. Whiche citrinatione is both a color and parte of the philosopher's stone. For as the vrine of manne, whitysshe, sheweth imperfecte digestione; but when he hathe well rested, and slept after the same, and the digestione perfected, the vrine becomethe citrine, or of a deepe yellowe color; so ys yt in alchymie: which made Arnolde call this citrinatione perfect digestion, or the color provinge the philosopher's stone broughte almoste to the height of perfectione.—Thynne. Animadversions. To Mast. T. Speghte.

CI'VET. Fr. Civett; animal odoriferant, from Arab. Zebed; scum-froth, (Menage.)

Civet is an unctuous substance secreted in a bag near the tail of a fierce quadruped, the Viverra zibetha of Linnæus, a native of the Brazils, the Coast of Guinea, and the East Indies.

Asot. Lady, I would descend to kiss your hand,
But that 'tis gloved, and civet makes me sick.
Massinger. The Bondsman, Act I. sc. 2.

As some one civet-wit among you, that knows no other learning, than the price of satten and velvets; nor other perfection, than the wearing of a neat sute; and yet will censure as desperately as the most profess'd critique in the house: presuming his clothes should bear him out in 't.
B. Jonson. Cynthia's Revels. Induction.

Civet-cats must be fretted and vexed before the civet is taken out of the bag, for the more the animal is enraged, the musk is the better:—the only case, I think, wherein fretfulness and rage turn to account and improve things.
Horne. Essays & Thoughts, § 30.

CIVIC. } Lat. Civicus; from Civis; (See CI'VICAL. } CITY.) Civic crowns.

Crowns for peaceful services to the city or state; opposed to military.

Augustus Cæsar gave unto him [Agrippa] a navall coronet for subduing the Sicilian pyrates: and himselfe received of mankind a civicke chaplet, for sparing the bloud, and saving the lives of so many citizens.
Holland. Plinie, b. xvi. c. 4.

The triumphal oval, and civicall crowns of laurel, oake, and myrtle, when fully made, were pleated after this order.
Brown. The Garden of Cyrus, c. 2.

The monarch, greatly conscious of his worth,
From books and his retirement call'd him forth;
Adorn'd the patriot with the civic crown,
The consul's fasces and patrician gown.—Rowe. Mæcenas.

[Cromwell] chose an Hale for his Chief Justice, though he absolutely refused to take his civick oaths, or to make any acknowledgment whatsoever of the legality of his government.—Burke. To a Member of the National Assembly.

Nay I am not come to sowe peace and concorde, but swearde and warre, and that inwarde and domesticall warre, and not civile warre onely.—Udal. Matthew, c. 10.

But surelye for my poore wytte, me thinketh it somewhat more civilytye, in some such pointes as this is, a litle merely to mok him, then with odious ernest argumentes, seriously to preace vpon him.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 951.

Alasse ther be peple rude of ther owne nature, and the more sad nede to be loked to, for reteynyng those in quyet and civilitie
Burnet. Records. Abp. Parker to Cecil, pt. iii b. vi. No. 64.

In summe, a great alteration vniuersally in the gouernment followed, and yet all was done quietly, ciuilly, peaceably, without trouble to prince, or offence to the subject.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 469.

O age inglorious, arms untimely borne,
When that approved and victorious shield
Must in this ciuil massacre be torne,
Bruis'd with the blows of many a foreign field.
Drayton. The Barons' Wars, b. ii.

——— Thou remembrest
Since once I sat vpon a promontory,
And heard a meare-maide on a dolphin's backe,
Vttering such dulcet and harmonious breath,
That the rude sea grew ciuill at her song.
Shakespeare. Midsummer Night's Dream, Act ii. sc. 2.

Ciuill society doth more content the nature of man, then any priuate kind of solitary liuing; because in society this good of mutuall participation is so much larger than otherwise.—Hooker. Ecclesiasticall Politie, b. i. s. 10.

Thus much Strabo witnesseth, men that are ciuill, do leade their liues after one common law appointing them what to doe for that other wise a multitude should, without harmonie amongst themselues, concurre in the doing of one thing (for this is ciuilly to liue,) or that they should in any sort menage communitie of life, it is not possible.
Id. Ib. b. i. s. 15.

In order to the civilizing of the Irishry, in the first year of his government, he [Sir A. Chichester] established two new circuits of assize.—Fuller. Worthies. Devonshire.

Museus first, then Orpheus civilize
Mankind, and gave the world their deities
To many gods they taught devotion,
Which were the distinct faculties of one.
Denham. The Progress of Learning.

Thus night oft see me in thy pale career,
Till ciuil suited morn appear. Milton. Il Penseroso.

The army, having resolved to finish the work, appointed a select number of persons, consisting for the most part of themselves and their creatures, to have the administration of civil affairs, calling them as I said before, a committee of safety.—Ludlow. Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 251.

About this time came forth a learned book, wrote by Doctor Ponet, or Poynet, now Bishop of Winchester, for the lawfulness of priests' marriage; which, in the year 1554, Dr. Martyn, the civilian, made an answer, such as it was, to.
Strype. Memoirs. Edw. VI. an. 1552.

Let due civilities be strictly paid:
The wall surrender to the hooded maid;
Nor let thy sturdy elbow's hasty rage
Jostle the feeble steps of trembling age.—Gay. Trivia, b. ii.

Her safety rescu'd Ireland to him owes;
And treacherous Scotland, to no interest true,
Yet blest that fate which did his arms dispose
Her land to civilize, as to subdue.
Dryden. On the Death of Oliver Cromwell.

When I consider, that the name of barbarians was given by the two noblest people of the earth, the Greeks and Romans, not only to all the rest of the world, but to one another, though both those nations were highly civilized, and the courtly Persians, and other voluptuous Asiaticks, were perhaps no less so than they; I doubt, that most nations in styling one another's manners extravagant and absurd, are guided more by education and partiality than by reason.
Boyle. Occasional Reflections, s. 6. Ref. 3.

And the very ingenious writer, as he passed through London, not only related it to me, but very civilly offered me farther satisfaction, if I could furnish him with a Romer, which I was very sorry, that where we then were, was not to be procured.—Id. Works, vol. v. p. 55.

O that unwelcome voice of heav'nly love,
Sad messenger of mercy from above!
How does it grate upon his thankless ear,
Crippling his pleasures with the cramp of fear!
His will and judgment at continual strife;
That ciuil war embitters all his life. Cowper. Truth.

If, therefore, as a religionist, he entered into society, it was for a reason different from that for which, as a civilist, he constituted a commonwealth; that is, it was not to guard himself against the malice of man.
Bp. Warburton. Alliance. Church & State, b. i. c. 5.

Nothing is more certain, than that our manners, our civilization, and all the good things which are connected with manners, and with civilization, have, in this European world of ours, depended for ages upon two principles, and were indeed the result of both combined; I mean the spirit of a gentleman, and the spirit of religion.
Burke. Reflections on the French Revolution.

Whatever England has been growing to by a progressive increase of improvement, brought in by varieties of people, by succession of civilising conquests and civilizing settlements in a series of seventeen hundred years, you shall see as much added to her by America in the course of a single life.—Id. On Conciliation with America.

But with respect to you, ye legislators, ye civilisers of mankind! ye Orpheuses, Moseses, Minoses, Solons, Theseuses, Lycurguses, Numas! with respect to you be it spoken, your regulations have done more mischief in cold blood, than all the rage of the fiercest animals in their greatest terrours, or furies, has ever done or ever could do.
Id. A Vindication of Natural Society.

The people behaved very civilly, shewing us every thing that we expressed a desire to see.
Cook. Voyages, vol. i. b. ii. c. 3.

CI'ZARED. Fr. Ciseaux; It. Cesoie. Variously written cisars or scissars; manifestly, says Junius, from Cisum, the past part. of cædere or cidere, to cut.

CLA'CKING, n. }

To make a noise like that of a clock; a continued, monotonous noise; incessant talk.

A clack dish,—a dish with a clacking lid or cover.

Though Venus smile with yelding eyes,
And swete musike doth play and sing,
Yet doth my spretes feele none of these,
The clacke doth at mine eare so ring.
Uncertaine Auctors. The Louer shewing, &c.

There is a generation of men, whose unweighed custome makes them clack out any thing their heedlesse fancy springes; that are so habited in falsehood, that they can outlye an almanack.—Feltham, pt. i. Res. 4.

That I dare boldly justify, that he
Who but one hour her loud clack can endure,
May undisturbed, safely, and secure
Sleep under any bells, and never hear
Tho' they were rung, the clappers at his ear.
Drayton. The Moon Calf.

It is a pity that his masters, the Jesuits, have no more trees for him to set with their roots upward: any thing rather then to weary the world with his foolish clacking.
Bp. Hall. The Honour of the Married Clergie.

Luc. Who, not the duke? Yes, you beggar of fifty: and his use was, to put a ducket in her clack-dish; the duke had crotchets in him.—Shakes. Meas. for Meas. Act iii. sc. 2.

The clack of tongues, and confusion of voices, in this new assembly, was so very great, that the Goddess was forced to command silence several times, and with some severity before she could make them attentive to her edicts.
Tatler, No. 102.

This they find by the noise of those boat mills; their clackers beat much slower at those times than else.
Blount. Voyage into the Levant, (1650), p. 18.

You're fair without, but foul within
With shame impregnated, and sin;
To you each impious scandal's owing,
You set each gossip's clack agoing.

Bartello he which writeth ryding tales,
Bringes in a knight which cladde was all in greene,
That sighed sore amidde his greeuous gales,
And was in hold as Bartholmew hath beene.
Gascoigne. Don Bartholmew of Bathe.

Out of whiche [goodly tower] sodaynly apperyd iii. ladyes richely clad in golde and sylke, with coronettes vpon theyr heddes: wherof the firste was named dame Nature, the second dame Grace, and the thirde dame Fortune.
Fabyan an. 1532.

——— Th' arch angel soon drew nigh,
Not in his shape celestial, but as man
Clad to meet man; over his lucid arms
A militarie vest of purple flow'd
Livelier than Meliboean, or the graine
Of Sarra, worn by kings and heroes old
In time of truce; Iris had dipt the woof.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. xi.

Within her breat, though calm; her breat though pure,
Motherly cares and fears got head, and rais'd
Some troubl'd thoughts, which she in sighs, thus clad.
Id. Paradise Regained, b. ii.

Here he distinguishes those who were invited, into three sorts. . . . . 2. Those who came, but had not on a wedding garment, i. e. believed Jesus to be the Messiah, but were not new clad (as I may say) with a true repentance, and amendment of life.—Locke. The Reasonableness of Christianity.

When the Portuguese came to land, they increased the astonishment of the poor inhabitants, who saw them clad in iron, with thunder and lightning in their hands.

CLAIM, v. }
CLAIM, n. }
CLA'IMANT. } Our present usage, Skinner thinks, is, with a slightly varied
CLA'IMER. } signification, from the Lat. Clamare, i. e. to demand a right by calling loudly for it. Clame, in Spenser; clamation, in Browne; and clamant in Thomson, are more literally from the Latin. See CLAME.

Fr. Clamer,—to call, cry, speak aloud or out. Also, to claim, to make a claim to, or lay in a claim for; to challenge, demand, pretend a title unto. (Cotgrave.)

Than tok kyng Knoute alle his homages,
That cleymed to hold of him ther heritages.
R. Brunne, p. 49.

—— And ouer this thei tell,
Her childe shall not emonge hem dwell
To clamen any herytage.—Gower. Con. A. b. ii.

Oh common people clayme nothing but right,
And ceasse to seeke that you haue neuer lost,
Striue not for trifles: make not all your might
To put your neighbours purse to needless cost.
Gascoigne. The Fruites of Warre.

Richarde, Duke of Yorke, a noble manne and a mightie, began not by warre, but by lawe, to chadenge the crowne, puttynge his claime into the parliamente.
Sir T. More. Workes, p. 36.

—— Where there is then no good
For which to strive, no strife can grow up there
From faction; for none sure will claim in hell
Precedence, none, whose portion is so small
Of present pains, that with ambitious mind
Will covet more. Milton. Paradise Lost, b. ii.

Yet ought he not aduance himselfe aboue his height,
He ought not make a claime to that he hath no right.
Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 162.

As to the proving the property of such ships and goods as shall be cast ashore by shipwrack, the council deems it necessary that an oath be administered in those courts which are already, or shall hereafter be constituted, where the claimers may be severally heard.
Milton. Answer to Danish Embassadors.

The French pretended that the bare owning of this title, since they gave him no assistance to make good his claim, was not a breach of the treaty. But this could not pass on the world, since the owning his right was a plain declaration that they would assist him in claiming it, whensoever the state of their affairs should allow of it.
Burnet. Own Time, an. 1701.

We had scarcely begun to put this into execution, when the three Indian boys started suddenly from some bushes, where they had concealed themselves, and again claimed our protection.—Cook. Voyage, vol. i. b. ii. c. 1.

They were told, in answer to their claim to the bread earned with their blood, that their services had not been rendered to the country that now exists.
Burke. Reflections on the French Revolution.

The pretensions of the three contending parties were laid before the Pope, to whom such disputes were highly pleasing; as he knew that all claimants willingly conspire to flatter and aggrandize that authority, from which they expect a confirmation of their own.
Id. Abridgement of English History, an. 1203.

CLAM, or CLEM. CLA'MMY. } Dut. Klam, clamp, tenax; Ger. Klammen, constringere, to hold tight; A. S. Clam, a band, and the A. S. verb, Clæmian; linire, oblinire, to anoint, to smear over, to clamme. Oblirmare, to harden or stiffen, (Somner.) Clamm'd, in Gloucestershire, Mr. Grose says, means to be choaked up, as the mill is clamm'd up; and in the north, starved. Ray, "Clem'd or clam'd, starved; because by famine, the guts and bowels are, as it were, clammed or stuck together. Sometimes it signifies thirsty; and we know in thirst the mouth is very often clammy." Piers Ploughman applies it to the sensation of cold; and see the example from Massinger.

The origin is this:—the A. S. Clæm-ian, is formed from Ge-laman, gliman, and, by change of g into c, and of the vowel i into e or æ, clæm-an, clæmian; (See To Lime).

To stick, to fasten together; to make, keep, or hold fast or tight together; to constringe, or constrain, or constrict.

Clammy,—sticky, glutinous; of an adhesive dampness.

—— And eet this when the hungreth
Othr wonne thou clomsest for cold othr clyngest for drouthe.
Piers Ploukman, p. 256.

The meate whiche hath virtue to extenuate, or make humours subtylle, it openeth the poores, and bryngeth forthe that whiche is faste in the flesshe, it maketh that whiche is clammye subtilie.—Sir T. Elyot. Castle of Health, b. iv.

A ligament or sinew is of a nature between gristles and nerves, framed of a tough and clammy portion of seed, for knitting and holding the bones together, and fitting them for motion.—P. Fletcher. The Purple Island, c. 2. Note.

—— And yet I
Solicitous to increase it, when my intrails
Were clemm'd with keeping a perpetual fast,
Was deaf to their loud windy cries.
Massinger. The Roman Actor, Act ii. sc. 1.

Hard is the choice when the valiant must eat their armes, or clem.—B. Jonson. Every Man out of his Hum. Act iii. sc. 6.

I cannot eat stones and turfs, say, What, will he clem me, and my followers? Aske him, an' he will clem me. doe, goe.
Id. Poetaster, Act i. sc. 2.

Amph. A chilling sweat, a damp of jealousie,
Hangs on my brows, and clams upon my limbs.
Dryden. Amphitryon, Act iii.

When it is green or first gathered, the juice is white and clammy, and it will stick like glew.
Dampier. Voyage, an. 1685.

In some a gentle horror crept at first
O'er all the limbs; the sluices of the skin
Withheld their moisture, till by art provok'd
The sweats o'erflow'd; but in a clammy tide:
Now free and copious, now restrain'd and slow.
Armstrong. The Art of Preserving Health, b. iii.

CLA'MBER. Sw. Clamra; clamber or clammer, from the verb to clamb; the preterperfect of which was written clam and clamben. See To Climb.

And now he had recover'd so much force,
As what with hers, and with the shepheard's aid,
He clamer'd up upon the shepheard's horse.
Harrington. Orlando, b. xlx. s. 20.

Whereupon, by reason that they who were climed up to the highest rounds, could not gain the parapet and discharge the ladder, and yet some or other still clambred up after, the ladders being overcharged with the weight, brake in peeces.
Holland. Livie, p. 620.

They [cucumbers] love both alike for to creepe and crawle with their winding top-branches or tendrils, and gladly they would be clambering upon walls, and climbing up to the house roof, if they can meet with any rough places to take hold by.—Id. Plinie, b. xix. c. 5.

Hark! my beloved's voice! behold him too!
Behold him coming in the distant view:
No clambering mountains make my lover stay,
For what are mountains in a lover's way?
Parnell. The Gift of Poetry.

Their strength is proportionate to their size, but they are accustomed to run upon rough ground, and therefore can with great agility skip over the bog, or clamber the mountain.

Clamor, in Shakespeare's Winter's Tale, upon which the commentators are at variance, may have been formed from clam; to clam, choak up, as used, according to Mr. Grose, in Gloucestershire. See To Clam.

For thus the common clamour is
In euery londe, where people dwelleth.
Gower. Con. A. Prologue.

But when they clamoured agaynste hym, yea, in so much that they were not afrayde blasphemously and slanderously to speake agaynste Jesus and Paule, he, hauving in remembraunce what the Gospell in that case woulde hym to doe, strooke his lappe.—Udal. Acts, c. 18.

As, where of late I sent a servant home about certain business, immediately after his comyng, the bishop's officers sacyted him to appearance, ransacking his house, forced him to deliver such bookes as he had; violently withholding them with vehement reproches and clamorouse exclamations against heretikes.
Burnet. Records, pt. iii. Letter to Cromwell, No. 38.

And further, that such conclusions as were clamorously, by the advocates of the party adverse, alledged to be superfluous, his lordship in the disputation and trial thereof in the consistory, did manifestly perceive that it was not so.
Id. b. ii. Bonner, Let. from Rome, April, 1532, No. 44.

Wherefore Jesus teachyng vs that it becometh not suche menne as have once consecrated themselves vnto the Holy Ghoste to have any thyng at all to doue with wicked spirites: he rebuked their clamouryng and crying; and sore threatenings added he withall, to put them to silence.
Udal. Luke, c. 4.

I knockt, but no man answerd me by name;
I cald, but no man answerd to my clame,
Yet I perseuer'd still to knocke and call
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. i. c. 10.

But their iterated clamations to excitate their dying or dead friends, or revoke them into life again, was a vanity of affection.—Brown. Urne Burial, c. 4.

'Tis well they are whispering: clamor your tongues, and not a word more.—Shakespeare. Winter's Tale, Act iv. sc. 3.

At sight of him the people with a shout
Rifted the air clamouring their god with praise,
Who had made their dreadful enemy their thrall.
Milton. Samson Agonister.

Greater crosses doe commonly swallow up the lesse; at least, lesser evils are either silent, or unheard, while the ear is filled with the clamor of the greater.
Bp. Hall. Cont. The Ark's Revenge.

The non-residence therefore of the minister, or even his neglects of duty, are a mere pretence set up against paying tithes; and I am afraid that if he would graciously remit his dues, too many of these clamourers would readily dispense with his residence.—Abp. Hort. Charge.

'Tis in this sense that I am poor,
And I'm afraid shall be so still,
Obstreperous creditors besiege my door,
And my whole house clamorous echoes fill.
Cotton. Poverty.

During these continual troubles in Mounster, the two lord justices which lay at Dublin were much eased from all martiall affaires elsewhere, and were troubled but with the clamorings, exclamations, and brabling of the Irish people, not worth the remembering.—Holinshed. Ireland, an. 1582.

Fled to some eminence, the husbandman
Helpless beholds the miserable wreck
Driving along; his drowning ox at once
Descending, with his labours scatter'd round,
He sees; and instant o'er his shivering thought
Comes winter unprovided, and a train
Of clamant children dear.—Thomson. Autumn.

We may much more easily think to clamour the sun and stars out of their courses, than to word the great Creator of them out of the steady purposes of his own will, by all the vehemence and loudness of our petitions.
South, vol. ii. Ser. 3.

The man resolv'd and steady to his trust,
Inflexible to ill, and obstinately just,
May the rude rabble's insolence despise,
Their senseless clamours and tumultuous cries.
Addison. Horace, b. iii. Ode 3.

In oozy beds profound the billows sleep.
No clamorous winds awake the silent deep;
Relax'd, they whisper in a gentle breeze,
And all around is universal peace.
Hughes. The Triumph of Peace.

But scarce the first sweet morsel Phineus took
When from the clouds with swift prevention broke,
Swift as the lightning's glance or stormy blast,
Whose rapid fury lays the forest waste,
Shrill clamouring for their prey the birds obscene.
West. The Story of Phineus.

When pain'd with hunger, the wild raven's brood
Loud calls on God, importunate for food:
Who hears their cry, who grants their hoarse request,
And stills the clamour of the craving nest!
Young. Paraphrase on part of the Book of Job.

Upon this, however, it was eagerly claimed by the right owners, who, supported by the other Indians, clamorously reproached him for invading their property, and prepared to take the canoe from him by force.
Cook. Voyage, vol. i. b. i. c. 13.

CLAMP. Dut. Klampe; formed from To Clam. To harden or stiffen; to tighten, to strengthen.

And they were joyned close both beneth, and also aboue with clampes.—Bible, 1551. Exodus, c. 36.

CLAN. CLA'NSHIP. } In Erse, a tribe or family, (Lye.) In Goth. Klans, parvulus; Klanain, parvuli, little children, (Luke, x. 21); Dut. Klayn, kleyn; Ger. Klein, parvus, small;—these seem to be words of the same origin, and to have been applied to the young, the children, offspring, progeny, descendants.

—— They around the flag
Of each his faction, in their several clanns,
Light arm'd or heavy, sharp, smooth, swift or slow,
Swarm populous. Milton. Paradise Lost, b. ii.

Then exil'd crouds abjure their native home,
And sad, in search of foreign mansions roam;
A youthful empress guides their airy clan,
And wheels and shoots illustrious from the van
Brooke. Universal Beauty, b. vi.

The books, of which I'm chiefly fond,
Are such as you have whilom comm'd;
That treat of China's civil law,
And subjects' right in Golconda;
Of highway-elephants at Ceylon,
To rob in clans, like men o' th' Highland.
Prior. Another Epistle to F. Shepherd, Esq.

The mountains on the south are well planted, and finely cultivated, high up, interspersed with the habitations of the highlanders, not singly, but in groupes, as if they loved society or clanship.—Pennant. Tour in Scotland.

CLA'NCULAR. CLA'NCULARLY. CLANDE'STINE. CLANDE'STINELY. } Lat. Clancularius, and Clandestinus, formed from Clam; itself of uncertain origin.

Fr. Clandestin,—close, privy, secret, hidden.

For you to fasten peculiarly upon that one supernumerary answer of mine, and to make such shews of triumph, and impute clancular dealing to that author, and a great deal more, (on so no manner of grounds or probabilities, when all is laid together) is that, which you ought to lay to your heart, though you will not the sad story.

Hammond. Works, vol. i. p. 184.

I will leave it to such as are to claim after the issue of Henry VII. to inv in bar the poligamy of Charles Brandon the Duke of Suffolk; and also the vitiated and clandestine contract, (if it may be so called) having no witness nor solemnization of Christian matrimony, nor any lawful matching of the Earl of Hartford and the Lady Katherine.

Burnet. Records, b. iii. No. 30. Lethington to Cecil. Jan 1566.

To this my Lord Bishop replyed, that for the first, since they were members of the synod, they would not do any thing clancularly, without the consent and privity of the whole company.—Hale's Let. from Dort. Dec. 1618.

A certain prisoner, (in 1581) sent a letter to him [Bp. Aylmer] wherein was some signification of a liberal gratification offered for his favour, perhaps to procure him liberty some clancular way.—Strype. Life of Aylmer, c. 14.

They were not done clancularly in a blind corner, among rude and simple people, but openly and visibly, every where about Judæa, the most lightsome place for knowledge and goodness in the world.—Barrow, vol. ii. Ser. 20.

But it will be urged still, that civil assemblies are open, and free for any one to enter into; whereas religious conventicles are more private, and thereby give opportunity to clandestine machinations.—Locke. Concerning Toleration.

The Jews had time to make what interest they could to prevent it [Haman's conspiracy] or to provide for their defence or escape, or at least to prepare themselves for death; whereas this was carried on so clandestinely that it was not to be known till executed.

Beveridge. Sermon on the 5th of Nov. 1704.

And is it thus Demetrius meets his friend,
He! in the mean disguise of Turkish robes,
With servile secresy to lurk in shades,
And vent our suff'rings in clandestine groans.

Johnson. Irene, Act i. sc. 1.

When it was found that Pope had clandestinely printed an unauthorised number of the pamphlet, [The Patriot] Lord Bolingbroke, in a fit of useless fury, resolved to blast his memory, and employed Mallet [1749] as an executioner of his vengeance.—Id. Life of Mallet.

CLANG, v. CLANG, n. CLA'NGOUR. CLA'NGOUS. } Ger. Klingen, tinnire; Klang, tinnitus; Dut. Klincken, klinglen; Fr. Clanger; Lat. Clangor, from the Gr. Κλαγγεω, which Vossius thinks—a sono fictum. Applied to—

The noise of cranes and some other birds, of hounds, of armour, of an arrow from a bow, of the trumpet, &c. See CLANK.

Now clattering armes, now raging broyls of warre
Gan passe the noyes of dredfull trompetts clang,
Shrowded with shafts the heauen; with cloude of darts
Covered the ayre.—Vncertaine Auctors. Death of Zorous.

Haue I not in a pitched battell heard
Loud larums, neighing steeds, and trumpets clangue,
And do you tell me of a woman's tongue.

Shakespeare. Taming the Shrew, Act i. sc. 2.

——— But feather'd soon and fledge
They summ'd their penns, and soaring th' air sublime
With clang despis'd the ground; under a cloud
In prospect. Milton. Paradise Lost, b. vii.

——— Straight the air doth groan
With trumpets, which thrice louder sounds do yield
Than deafning thunders in the airy field.
Created nature at the clangour quakes.

Drummond. The Shadow of Judgment.

As for the musical advantage, although it seem more reasonable, yet do we not observe that cranes and birds of long necks have any musical, but harsh and clangous throats.

Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. vii. c. 14.

——— The hunter's shout,
The clanging horns swell their sweet winding notes.
The pack wide opening load the trembling air
With various melody. Somerville. The Chase, b. ii.

——— Thus arm'd, away they stalk
Undaunted: o'er their heads the martial maid
Bends on the right an heron; the ambient gloom
Conceals him from the view, but loud in air
They hear the clangor of his sounding wings.

Broome. The Tenth Iliad of Homer.

——— To that field I came,
Tre yet with ruthless joy the happy hound
Told hill and dale that reynard's track was found,
Or with the high-raised horn's melodious clang
All Kilwick and all Dinge derry rang

Cowper. The Needless Alarm.

CLANK, v. CLANK, n. } To Clang, (qv.) merely with the change of g into k.

'Twixt his right ribs deep pierc'd the furious blade,
And open'd wide those secret vessels, where
Life's light goes out, when first they let in air.
He falls! his armour clanks against the ground.

Cowley. The Davideis, b. iv.

What clanks were heard, in German skies afar,
Of arms and armies, rushing to the war.

Dryden. Virgil. Georgic, b. i.

The noise of stripes, the clank of chains, and the groans of the tortured, strike even the pious Æneas with a kind of horror.—Tatler, No. 154.

Now o'er the smoaking vale each gen'rous steed,
Relaxes from the fervour of his speed:
Push'd up the bray, indignantly they feel
The clanking lash, and the retorted steel.

Brooke. The Fox Chase.

Now is the the dreadful hour, now will our torches
Glare with more livid horrour, now our shrieks
And clanking arms will more appall the foe.

Mason. Caractacus.

CLAP, v. CLAP, n. CLA'PPER, v. CLA'PPER, n. CLAP-DISH, } Sw. Klappa; Dut. Klappen; Ger. Klopfen, pulsare, percutere, ferire. Sommer explains the A. S. Clappan, "palpitare, to leap as the hart doth, to move, to dance, to pant, to clappe." And it may have been formed by the common course of corruption, from the A. S. Ge-hleap-an, gleapan, and by change of g into c, and the omission of e, clap-an, or clappan.

It appears to have originally denoted some such quick and repeated motion, as the leaping, beating, or pulsation of the heart; and then, more generally, other quick motions or actions,—as to clap hands, to strike them quickly together; to applaud; to clap to a door, to shut it quickly; to clap up in prison, to shut up quickly, suddenly; to clap on, to put on, quickly; (met.) to clap up a marriage, to close or conclude it quickly, suddenly.

It is also applied to the sound which attends such quick and repeated motions or actions, as to clap at the door; knock, strike at it quickly.

Clap-dish,—see the quotation from Ray's Proverbial Phrases.

For eft it wille be wroken with a hardere klap.

R. Brunne, p. 116.

Many grete mishappes, many harde trauaile,
Haf comen vs hard clappes whan thei gan vs assaile.

Whiche hath no clapper for to chyme. Id. Ib. b. iv.

Such kindly wages Cupide payes,
Where constant hearts cannot remaine,
I hope to see you in such bandes,
When I may laugh and clappe my handes.

Gascoigne. The Dole of Disdain.

They left me nothing but my clothes to put on my backe, and so brought mee to Tirwill to the captaine's house, where before I dyned, I had a payre of fetters clapped on my legges, wherewithall I sate vntil it was Munday in Easter weeke.—Hacluyt. Voyages, vol. i. pt. i. p. 304.

Foure dayes after this vncomfortable separation in the morning toward ten of the clocke we had a terrible clap of thunder, which slew foure of our men out right, their necks being wrung in sonder without speaking any word, and of 94 men there was not one vntouched.

Hacluyt. Voyages, vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 103.

Why my lord, saith he, doth your lordship make so great a matter of the bell that lacketh his clapper? Here is a bell (saith he) and pointed to the pulpit, that had lacked a clapper this twenty years. We have a parson that fetcheth out of his benefice fifty pound every yeere, but we never see him.—Latimer. Sixth Sermon before King Edward.

And forasmuch as thou art a Christen man, and rejoycest in Christ, I dare boldlye affirme for thee, that thou takest neyther pleasure nor ioye of that place, like as some persons do, which triumphed of late, and with much ioye and clapping of handes sent tidings into all partes, that purgatorie was founde agayne.—Frith. Works, p. 60.

So Phidias was clapt up in prison, and there died of a sickness, or else of poison (as some say)

North. Plutarch, p. 146.

So marcheth home, and by her takes the knight,
Whom all the people follow with great glee,
Shouting and clapping all their hands on light,
That all the aire it ilis, and flyes to heaven bright.

Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. I. c. 5.

And when thy noble body is in durance,
Thus do we clap our musty murrions on,
And trace the streets in terrour.

Beaum. & Fletch. Philaster, Act v. sc. i.

There is no way but to clap up a marriage in hugger-mugger.—Ford. 'Tis Pity She's a Whore, Act iii. sc. 2.

Now surely, shepherd, here's a goodly song,
Upon my word, I never heard a worse,
Away, old fool, and learn to use thy tongue,
I would thy clap were shut up in my purse.

Drayton, Ecl. 8.

And with the thunder claps of clashing armes
Made aire to sigh with sound of human armes.

Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 568.

At every time that he [Menenius] was named, the affectionate favour of the people that stood in the streets appeared, by clapping of hands and great applause.

Holland. Livie, p. 174.

——— And when trimm'd up
To the height, as thou imagin'st, in mine eyes,
A leper with a clap-dish, (to give notice
He is infectious,) in respect to thee,
Appears a young Adonis.

Massinger. The Parliament of Love, Act ii. sc. 2.

This chanticleer, of whom the story sings,
Stood high upon his toes, and clapped his wings;
Then stretched his neck, and wink'd with both his eyes,
Ambitious, as he sought th' Olympic prize.

Dryden. The Cock and the Fox.

It is not poetry that makes men poor;
For few do write that were not so before;
And those that have writ best, had they been rich,
Had never been clapp'd with a poetic itch.

Butler. Miscellaneous Thoughts.

If you fill not the vessel up to the top, but leave some space empty for the air to take up, and then clap your hand upon the mouth of the vessel, the fishes will presently contend which shall get uppermost in the water, that so they may enjoy the open air.—Ray. On the Creation, pt. i.

Whereupon Cromwell clapping him on the shoulder, said, "Get the gone for a mad fellow as thou art."

Ludlow. Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 127.

The first of these are in the best state of the three, by having their minds yet in their perfect freedom and indifferency, the likelier to pursue truth the better, having no bias yet clap'd on to mislead them.

Locke. Conduct of the Understanding, s. 33.

As the audience is not a little abashed, if they find themselves betrayed into a clap, when their friend in the upper gallery does not come into it; so the actors do not value themselves upon the clap, but regard it as meer bruteum fulmen, or empty noise, when it has not the sound of the oaken plant in it.—Spectator, No. 235.

As soon as we came in the great hall, there stood many flaggons ready charged, the General called for wine to drink the King's health; they brought him a formal bell of silver gilt, that might hold about two quarts or more; he took it empty, pulled out the clapper, and gave it me, who he intended to drink to, then had the bell filled, drank it off to his Majesty's health, then asked me for the clapper, put it in, turned down the bell, and rung it out, to show he had played fair, and left nothing in it; took out the clapper, desired me to give it to whom I pleased, then gave his bell to be filled again, and brought it to me.

Sir W. Temple. Letter to Sir J. Temple.

He claps his dish at a wrong man's door.
Ray. Proverbial Phrases.

But they never changed the spot, as we do in dancing, and though their feet were not at rest, this exercise consisted more in moving the fingers very nimbly, at the same time holding the hands in a prone position near the face, and now and then clapping them together.
Cook. Voyage, vol. v. b. ii. c. 2.

As they rode thus forth, the page that bare the speare, whether it were by neclygence, or that he fell aslepe, he lette the speare fall on the other page's heed that rode before hym, and the heed of the speare made a great classhe on the bright chapewe of stele.
Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. ii. c. 186.

Some men wolde say, that in mediocritie, whiche I haue soo moche praysed in shootyng, why shuld not bouling, claishe, pynnes, and koytynge, be as moche commended?
Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. i. c. 27.

——— Highly they raged
Against the Highest, and fierce with grasped arms,
Clash'd on their sounding shields the din of war,
Hurling defiance toward the vault of heav'n.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. i.

Then from the clashes between popes and kings,
Debate, like sparks from flints' collision, springs.
Denham. The Progress of Learning.

To thee, thou brave Calliope, we come,
Thou that maintain'st the trumpet and the drum,
The neighing-steeds that lov'st to hear,
Clashing of arms doth please thine ear.
Drayton. The Muses' Elysium, Nymphal 3.

At length the nodding statue clash'd his arms,
And with a sullen sound and feeble cry,
Half sunk, and half pronounced the word of victory.
Dryden. Palamon & Arcite, b. iii.

If any law, or command of man do clash with any law of God; that is, if it be either evil in itself, or contradictory to the duty of Christians as laid in the Scriptures; in that case, that law, or command, by what human authority soever it was made or given, doth not bind our conscience, nor is any rule of our actions.
Sharp, vol. ii. Ser. 5. A Discourse of Conscience,

For what can be said more to such persons, that are either so disengenuous or so stupid, as to profess to believe that all the admirable endowments and capacities of human nature, which we sometimes see actually existent in one and the same person, can proceed from the blind shuffling and casual clashing of atoms.—Bentley, Ser. 2.

The fact notorious, nor obscure the cause,
We wear the chains of pleasure and of pride.
These share the man; and these distract him too;
Draw different ways, and clash in their command.
Young. Complaint, Night 5.

Next Anger rush'd, his eyes on fire,
In lightnings own'd his secret stings,
In one rude clash he struck the lyre,
And swept with hurried hand the strings.
Collins. Ode on the Passions.

CLASP, v. CLASP, n. CLA'SPER. CLA'SPING, n. } By Chaucer written Clapse; and Junius thinks it probable that the word was originally written Clapsen or Clipsen, from the A.S. Clyppan,—

To clip, to embrace; and thus—to hold fast, to fasten, to enclose.

His botes clapsed fayre and fetisly.
Chaucer. The Prologue, v. 275.

So wyde and large is the loue, whiche I beare towarde you, that I claspe and embrace you all together with my whole harte. Receiue ye me lykewise, as I am, into your hartes.
Udal. 2 Cor. c. 7.

Hee put in the ballast of the said ships, great store of beames of thicke planks, being hollow and beset with yron pikes beneath, but on each side full of claspe and hookes to loyne them together.—Hacluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 594.

Mens bodies dead he did deuise to loyne to bodies quick
In tortures, hands to hands, and mouthes to mouthes,
them binding thick,
(O plague most miserous) and them through filth and rotting cloied
In wretched claspings vyle.
Phaer. Virgill. Æneidos, b. viii. p. 192.

Forsake me not thus, Adam, witness Heav'n
What love sincere and reverence in my heart
I bear thee, and unweeting have offended,
Unhappily deceav'd; thy suppliant
I beg, and clasp thy knees.—Milton. Paradise Lost, b. x.

I am not of opinion to think the church a vine in this respect, because, as they take it, she cannot subsist without clasping about the elm of worldly strength and felicity, as if the heavenly city could not support itself without the props and buttresses of secular authority.
Id. Of Reformation in England.

——— Nothing but the round
Large claspe of nature, such a wit can bound.
B. Jonson. Epistle to Mr. John Selden.

Yet, here are no such trifles brought,
No cobweb cail's; no surcoates wrought
With gold, or claspes, which might be bought
On every stall. Id. The Faire Fame.

Claspers are of a compound nature between that of a root and a trunk. Their use is sometimes for support only; as in the claspers of vines, briony, &c. Those of briony have a retrograde motion about every third circle, in form of a double clasp, so that if they miss one way, they may catch the other.—Sometimes the use of claspers is also for a supply, as in the trunk roots of ivy;—sometimes also they serve for stabiliment, propagation, and shade.

Derham. Physico-Theology, b. x. Note 19.

Such strange events, such unexpected chances,
Beyond my warmest hope, or wildest wishes,
Concurr'd to give me to Aspasia's arms,
I stand amaz'd, and ask, if yet I clasp thee.

Johnson. Irene, Act iii. sc. 10.

CLA'SSICK, n.
CLA'SSICAL.
CLA'SSICALLY.
CLASSIFICA'TION.

Sp. Classe; It. Classe; Fr. Classe; Lat. Classis, a calando, (Quint. l. 6. 23.) And Vossius has no doubt that Classis is either a calando, or from the Gr. Κλησις, ab eodem καλειν, to call. Classis, generally, is—called; a multitude called or convoked. Applied in Latin—

First, to ships and seamen called together. Then to the people called together into divisions. Then to any division, distribution, or arrangement into ranks or orders.

Classick or classical,—pertaining to divisions into ranks or orders; arranged in orders; orderly: and as those of the first class, (Aulus Gel. 7. 13,) were by eminence called classici; hence the application of the word classick, (Aul. Gel. 19. 9.) to—

Authors of the first rank or order of merit; and now particularly to those of Greece and Rome.

What a mad world would it be, that the ecclesiastical lawes of such a company should be, like those of the Medes and Persians, irrevocable? That there should be no appeal from them? for, as for classes and synods, they may advise in cases of doubt, but ouer-rule they may not.

Bp. Hall. Episcopacy by Divine Right, s. 6.

The reformed churches, in France, call it a presbytery; and the meeting of the elders over many congregations, that they call the classis. And what doth make a classical eldership to be a presbytery; but that materially there are elders that have relation to those congregations, and that formally they are united for acts in common.

Goodwin. Works, vol. iv. p. 114.

But there her girdle and her shoes she eats
For that acquaintance which they had of old
With beef and mutton and such classick meats.

Beaumont. Psyche, c. 11. s. 65.

The poet, as usual, expresses his own feeling, but he does more, he expresses it very classically.

Cowley. The Country Life, N. 3.

Now God Almighty by the inexhaustible fecundity of his creative power may have made innumerable orders and classes of rational minds; some in their natural perfections higher than human souls, others inferior.—Bentley, Ser. 8.

The other five parts were to be distributed equally among the officers and mariners of the ships, put in five different classes. all the classes that the merchants desired, to encourage privateers, were readily granted. and it was hoped that a great stock would be raised to carry on the private war.—Burnet. Own Time, an. 1708.

He [Richard Reeve] was accounted a perfect philologist, admirably well vers'd in all classical learning.

Wood. Athenæ Oxon.

These are often pretty classical scholars, and would think it an unpardonable sin to read Virgil or Martial with so little taste as they do divine service.—Spectator, No. 147.

——— Who but inflam'd
With classic zeal, these consecrated scenes
Of men and deeds to trace, unhappy land,
Would trust thy wilds, and cities loose of away.

Thomson. Liberty, pt. i.

But no such constancy can be expected in a people polished by arts, and classed by subordination, where one part of the community is sustained and accommodated by the labour of the other.—Johnson. Preface to the English Dictionary.

Those of our company, who had been here with the Dolphin, told us that none of the people, whom we had yet seen were of the first class.—Cook. Voyage, vol. i. b. i. c. 8.

Mr. Greaves (who, as Dr. Arbuthnot observes, may be justly reckoned a classical author upon the subject) has valued it (the denarius) at sevenpence three farthings.

Melmoth. Pliny, b. ii. Let. 11. n

Till late Corneille, with Lucan's spirit fir'd,
Breath'd the free strain, as Rome and he inspir'd;
And classic judgment gain'd to sweet Racine
The temperate strength of Maro's chaster line.

Colins. An Epistle. To Sir T. Hanmer.

Under the tuition of Mr. Reynolds he was for some time instructed in the classicks; but, at an early age, his inclination for that art, of which he afterwards became so illustrious a professor, began to display itself.

Malone. Life of Sir J. Reynolds.

It is for this reason that Montesquieu observed very justly, that in their classification of the citizens, the great legislators of antiquity made the greatest display of their powers and even soared above themselves.

Burke. On the French Revolution.

CLA'TTERING, n.

Dut. Klateren, strepere; A.S. Clatrunge, and "Cleadur, crepitaculum, a drumme or rattle. Whence happily our clatter or clutter, for—

A kind of rude and confused sound, or noise," (Somner.)

Ther every man cryeth and clatereth what him liketh.

Chaucer. The Tale of Melibeus.

And eke the dores clattereden ful faste,
Of which Arcita somwhat him agaste.

Id. The Knightes Tale, v. 2425.

But the mother agayne on her parte; being myndefull of her owne wise and discrete sobrenesse, dyd as yet make no babblyng out abrode of any thing (as other women vse to bee full of clatteryng and bablyng.)—Udal. Luke, c. 2.

Make noise ynoughe, for clatterars loue no peace.

Skelton. The Crowne of Laurel.

For pride first forced me my prince to flatter
So much, that whatsoeuer pleas'd his heart
Were't nere so ill, I thought a lawful matter;
Which caus'd the lords afresh against him clatter.

Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 288.

I only with an oak'n staff will meet thee,
And raise such out-cries on thy clatter'd iron,
Which long shall not withhold me from thy head.

Milton. Samson Agonistes.

——— There thou should'st be,—
By this great clatter, one of greatest note
Seemes bruited. Shakespeare. Macbeth, Act v. sc. 7.

What fulminations and clattering of clouds is there to be heard in that horizon!—Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 615.

At present therefore it will not be amiss to let you see that the clattering of weapons did not banish this magnanimous prince from the professing of piety, and the love of learning.—Life of Charlemain. App. to North's Plutarch.

Hail, and farewell they shouted out amain,
Thrice facing to the left, and thrice they turn'd again:
Still as they turn'd, they beat their clattering shields:
The women mix their cries; and clamour fills the fields.

Dryden. Palamon & Arcite, b. iii.

When in my gilded coach I ride,
My lady at his lordship's side,
How will I laugh at all I meet
Clatt'ring in pattens down the street.

Lloyd. The Milk Maid.

To inhabit a mansion remote,
From the clatter of street-pacing steeds,
And by Philomel's annual note
To measure the life that she leads.—Cowper. Catherina.

Bless me! what a clattering of white sticks and yellow sticks would be about his head.

Burke. On Œconomical Reform.

CLAUDICA'TION. Lat. Claudicare, from claudere, to close, to end.

To fall short, to be deficient, to halt.

I have lately contracted a very honest and undissembled claudication in my left foot, which will be a double affliction to me, if (according to your Tatler of this day) it must pass upon the world for a piece of singularity and affectation.

Tatler, No. 60.

CLA'VICLES. "It. Clavicule; Fr. Clavicules; the kannel bones, channel bones, neck bones, craw bones; extending (on each side-one) from the bottom of the throat unto the top of the shoulder," (Cotgrave.)

Such thereof [viviparous quadrupeds] as can bring their fore-feet and meat therein unto their mouths; as most can do that have clavicles or collar-bones.

Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iii. c. 1.

CLAUSE, n. It. Clausula; Fr. Clause, from Clausus, the past part. of claudere, to close, shut up or fasten.

That which closes or encloses, that which comprises or contains: (met.) such a member, part or division of a sentence, paragraph, discourse or writing, as encloses or includes, comprises or contains, a full and complete sense or meaning.

To wise is he to doen so great a vice
Ne als I nil him neuer so cherice
That he shal make auaunt by iust cause
He shal me neuer bind in such a clause.

Chaucer. Troilus, b. ii.

Clerkus that were confessours coupled hem togederes
To construe this clause. Piers Ploughman, p. 71.

Which of what moment they be I have written my opynyon to your gr, & noted, in the margine of the commissions by them graunted, & asked by us, the considerations of every clause & word material.

Strype. Records. No. 24. Dr. Gardiner, &c. to the Cardinal.

They a bold power o'er sacred Scriptures take,
Blot out some clauses, and some new ones make.

Cowley. On the late Civil War.

Saturday, November 30, the King had two bills presented to him; one of which, viz. for exclusion of all popish members to sit in either house of parliament (with a clause in favour of the Duke of York) he pass'd.

Baker. Charles II. an. 1678.

In these words are two clauses, in the first whereof the Psalmist admires the multitude of God's works, How manifold are thy works, O Lord! In the second he celebrates his wisdom in the creation of them, In wisdom hast thou made them all.—Ray. On the Creation, pt. i

But it, [the act for triennial parliaments] was now given up without a struggle, or any clauses for a certainty of parliaments, besides a general one, that there should be a parliament called within three years after the dissolution of the present parliament, and so ever afterwards.

Burnet. Own Time, an. 1663.

To provide for these objects, and therefore to exclude for ever the old Jewry doctrine of "a right to choose our own governours," they follow with a clause, containing a most solemn pledge, taken from the preceding act of Queen Elizabeth,—as solemn a pledge as ever was or can be given in favour of an hereditary succession, and as solemn a renunciation as could be made of the principles by this society imputed to them.—Burke. On the French Revolution.

To remove uneasy feelings, to ease, to lull, to soothe,—by mean services; and (met.) to flatter; and a claw-back, a flatterer. Gower writes Clees as the plural of the noun, and B. Jonson, Cleis.

——— Power hym failleth.
To clutche other to clawe. Piers Ploughman, p. 329.

Whou thei curreth kynges, and her bak claweth.

Id. Crede.

But such an ease therwith they her wrought,
Right as a man is eased for to pelo
For ache of hedde, to clawen him on his hele.

Chaucer. Troilus, b. iv.

And as a catte wolde ete fishes
Without wetynge of his clees:
So wolde he do, but nethelea
He faileth ofte of that he wolde.—Gower. Con. A. b. iv.

A myghty tirrane it was, which, hauyng a trayne of an houge compaigny of souldiers to garde him, did ruffle and playe the king ouer al sortes of men, out of whose clawes it was not possible by any power of manne to recouer the deliueraunce of the Israelites.—Udal. Luke, c. 1.

Yea, I can tell them clawyngly
(but this is in their eare)
That those whiche haue disposde them thus,
are persecuters cleare Drant. Horace, b i. Sat. 5.

Clerkes must to be taught to claw, and not to clatter.

Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 455.

Rich men they claw, sooth up and flatter: the poor they contemn and despise.—Holland. Plutarch, p. 13.

Here it is not the style to claw and compliment with the King, or idolize him by sacred Sovereign, and most excellent Majesty; but the Spaniard, when he petitions to his King, gives no other character but Sir, and so relating his business, at the end doth ask and demand justice of him.

Howell, b. i. s. 3. Let. 10.

But her fierce servaunt, full of kingly awe
And high disdaine, when, as his soveraigne dame
So rudely handled by her foe he sawe,
With gaping iawes full greedy at him came;
And ramping on his shield, did weene the same
Have reft away with his sharp rending clawes.

Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. i. c. 3.

Sleepie or stupid nature, couldst thou part
With such a raritie, and not rowse art
With all her aydes, to save her from the seize
Of vulture death, and those relentless clees?

B. Jonson. An Elegie on my Muse

The ouer-weening of thy wits
Doth make thy foes to smile,
Thy friends to weepe and claw-back thee
With soothings to beguile.
Warner. Albion's England, b. v. c. 25.

And when she often used the saying, That most men neglected the setting sun, these flattering claw backs ceased not to beat into her ears, who will neglect the wholsome beams of the clear sunshine, to behold the pitifull and confused sparkling of the smaller stars rising together? For so they called the competitours.—Camden. Elizab. an. 1573.

But some one, like a claw-back parasite,
Pick'd mothes from his master's cloke in sight,
Whiles he could pick out both his eyes for need,
Mought they but stand him in some better stead.
Bp. Hall, b. vi. Sat. 1.

Among quadrupeds, of all the clawed, the lyon is the strongest.—Grew. Cosmol. Sacra, b. ii. c. 8.

The squash is a four-footed beast, bigger than a cat; its head is much like a foxe's, with short ears and a long nose. It has pretty short legs and sharp claws, by which it will run up trees like a cat.—Dampier. Voyage, an. 1678.

I do not see a variety of objects, reconciled in one consistent whole, but several contradictory principles reluctantly and irreconcileably brought and held together by you philosophers, like wild beasts shut up in a cage, to claw and bite each other to their mutual destruction.
Burke. On the French Revolution.

Mr. Banks tried to fish from the cabbin windows with hook and line: the water was too shallow for fish, but the ground was almost covered with crabs, which readily took the bait, and sometimes held it so fast in their claws, that they did not quit their hold till they were considerably above water.

CLA'EY.
CLA'YISH.

A. S. Clag; Dut. Kley, from the Ger. Kleben, hærere, adhærere, to stick or adhere. To clay (not common in writing) is—

To cover or smear over with clay; i. e. with earth of a sticky, clammy nature.

Whanne he haidde seid these thingis, he spitte into the eerthe, and made clay of the spitil, and anointed the clay on his yghen.—Wiclif. John, c. 9.

As sone as he had thus spoken, he spat on the grounde and made clave of the spetle, and rubbed the clave on the eies of the blynde.—Bible, 1551. Ib.

An evill man is clay to God, wax to the Devill. God may stampe him into powder, or temper him anew; but none of his meanes can melt him. Contrariwise, a good man is God's wax, and Satan's clay; he relents at every looke of God, but is not stirred at any tentation.
Bp. Hall. Meditations & Vows.

——— For now began

Could the great guest no longer hold.
Carew. Epitaph on Lady M. Villers.

Small beer proves an unwholesome drink, perhaps by being brewed with thick, muddish, clayish, water.
Harvey. On Consumption.

Alas! we poor mortals upon earth, that ordinarily converse with nothing but dirt and clay, cannot here behold the glory that shines above yonder glorious sun.
Bp. Beveridge, vol. ii. Ser. 22.

There honour comes, a pilgrim grav,
To bless the turf that wraps their clay,
And freedom shall a while repair,
To dwell a weeping hermit there!

Roscommon. Horace. Art of Poetry.

I do not find that any of your critical essays are taken notice of in this paper, notwithstanding I look upon them to be excellent cleansers of the brain.—Spectator, No. 548

On the other side, Amsterdam will ever oppose the opening and cleansing of the old channel of the Rhine, which, they say, might easily be compassed, and by which the town of Leyden would grow maritime, and share a great part of the trade, now engrossed by Amsterdam.
Sir W. Temple. Obs. on the United Provinces, c. 3.

What remains of the body is taken down from the bier, and the bones having been scraped and washed very clean, are buried according to the rank of the person.
Cook. Voyage, vol. i. b. i. c. 19.

Whenever one sees a picture of Rubens that wants union, it may be justly suspected that it has been in the hand of some picture cleaner, by whom it has been retouched.
Sir J. Reynolds. Journey to Flanders.

So that we were obliged to take it [the biscuit] all on shore here, where it underwent another airing and cleaning, in which a good deal was found wholly rotten and unfit to be eaten.—Cook. Voyage, vol. v. b. ii. c. 2.

There is a kind of anxious cleanliness which I have always noted as the characteristick of a slattern. it is the superfluous scrupulosity of guilt, dreading discovery, and shunning suspicion: it is the violence of an effort against habit, which, being impelled by external motives, cannot stop at the middle point.—Rambler, No. 115.

Winds from all quarters agitate the air,
And fit the limpid element for use,
Else noxious, oceans, rivers, lakes and streams,
All feel the fresh'ning impulse, and are cleans'd
By restless undulation. Cowper. Task, b. i.

CLE'ARING, n.
CLE'ARLY.
CLE'ARNESS.

It. Chiaro; Sp. Claro; Fr. Clair; Lat. Clarus, quasi calarus, a calando, id est, vocando. Vossius and Scaliger agree that the word is borrowed ab athletis, who, when victorious, were called or proclaimed (calabantur) by the criers or heralds, et ita clarabantur (renowned.) Hence the expression of Horace, clarabit pugilem. See To CLARY.

So proclaim, (sc.) as victor, is thus the primary meaning. And thus to clear, is—

To make, or cause to be, known; to confer renown, render famous, illustrious or conspicuous; to withdraw or free from obscurity, secrecy, loneliness, darkness; to make or cause to be, plain, evident, perspicuous;—to free from disgrace or infamy, from imputation of crime; and thus to vindicate or justify; to show or prove to be fair, sincere, or honest;—to remove or free from any thing that overshades or overclouds, that hinders or stands in the way, obstructs or impedes, embarrasses or encumbers, or endangers; to free from loss, injury, or danger.

Vor ther come fraine hyre a leme suythe cler & bryyte,

And Christ clerly forbad his Christene, &c.
Piers Ploukman. Crede.

And he answerede and seide to hem whanne the eventide is come ye seyn it schal be cleer, for heyene is redy
Wiclif. Matthew, c. 16.

And he beheld & seyde y se men as trees walkinge. Afterwarde eftsoones he sette hise hondis on hise yghen and he bigan to se, and he was restorid so that he sayyh clerely alle thingis.—Id. Mark, c. 8.

And he looked vp and said: I se the men: for I se thē walcke, as they were trees. After that he put his handes agayne vpō his eyes, and made him se. And he was restored to his sight, and saw euery mā clerely—Bible, 1551. Ib.

And thei felden doun in the sight of the trone on her faces, and worschipiden God and seiden, amen, blessyng and clerenesse and wisdom and doing of thankyngis and onour and vertue and strengthe to oure God into worldis of worldis, amen.—Wielif. Apocalips, c. 7.

Seke ye Scripturis, in whiche ye gessen to haue euerlastynge lyf, and tho it ben that beren witnessyng of me and ye wolen not come to me, that ye haue lyf. I take not clerenesse of men.—Id. John, c. 5.

The brenning of the fire of this world shal God yeve in helle to hem that ben dampned, but the light and clerenesse and he yeve in heven to his children.

Chaucer. The Persones Tale.

Right now the highe windes blowe:
And anon after thei ben lowe.
Now cloudie, and now clere it is.—Gower. Con. A. Prol.

The Foresight of the Queene's commaunded by M. Thomas Vauasor performed a very great fight, and stayed two houres as neere the Reuenge as the weather would permit him, not forsaking the fight, till he was like to be encompassed by the squadrons, and with great difficultie cleared himself

Hackuyt. Voyages, vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 173.

For I haue ouerlooked when that in these long stormes and tempestes of warres, there wounde some fayre wether or clerenes of peace shyne vpon vs out of one quarter of other.

Udal. Preface to Mark.

One way there is therefore, and but one way of safetye, even to make a brave sallie through and away. This must wee doe, either by day or by night. And that doubt is soon cleared.—Holland. Livie, p. 274.

And as from top of some steepe hill, the lightner strips a cloud,
And lets a great skie out from heaven, in whose delightsome light,
All prominent foreheads, fortrests, towres, and temples cleare the sight,
So clear'd these Greeks, this Trojan cloud.

Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. xvi.

——— The birds
Who all things now behold more fresh and green
After a night of storm so ruinous,
Clear'd up their choicest notes in bush and spray
To gratulate the sweet return of morn.

Milton. Paradise Regained, b. iv.

When whose bright chariot stoopt to sea, and twilight hid the cleare,
All soundly on their cables slept.

Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. i.

——— I thither went
With unexperienc't thought, and laid me downe
On the green bank, to look into the clear
Smooth lake, that to me seem'd another skie.

Milton. Paradise Lost, b. iv.

Fame is the spur that the clear spirit doth raise
(That last infirmity of noble mind)
To scorn delights, and live laborious days.—Id. Lycidas.

O prophet of glad tidings, finisher
Of utmost hope! now clear I understand
What oft my steddiest thoughts have searcht in vain;
Why our great expectation shoul'd be call'd
The seed of woman. Id. Paradise Lost, b. xii.

And the cause why the people did bear him such ill will, for the controversie they had with the nobility about clearing of debts, grew for that they knew well enough it was not for any gain or benefit he had gotten thereby, so much as it was for spite and displeasure he thought to do them.

North. Plutarch, p. 203.

Huge are the odles betwixt the best and bad;
Which darkely here, hence shall be cleerely view'd.
When of God's wrath the winde sifts soules at last,
They shall abide, you vanish at a blast.

Stirling. Dooms-Day. The First Houre.

And although the air which compasseth adversity, be very obscure, yet therein we better discern God, than in that shining light which environeth worldly glory; through which, for the clearness thereof, there is no vanity which escapeth our sight.—Raleigh. Hist. of the World, Pref. p. xx.

O potent sympathy! which canst beguile
An heart so pure and clear-ey'd, and degrade
Earth's monarch from his native pinnacle
Of innocence, as low as sin and hell.

Beaumont. Psyche, c. 6. s. 306.

But although innocency needs no defence as to itself, yet it is necessary for all the advantages it hath of doing good to mankind, that it appear to be what it really is; which cannot be done, unless its reputation be cleared from the malicious aspersions, which are cast upon it.

Stillingfleet, vol. i. Ser. 3.

Multitudes of words are neither an argument of clear ideas in the writer, nor a proper means of conveying clear notions to the reader.—Dr. Clarke. Fifth Reply.

Gold is a wonderful clearer of the understanding: it dispatches every doubt and scruple in an instant; accommodates itself to the meanest capacities; silences the loud, and clamorous, and brings over the most obstinate and Lucretius.—Spectator, No. 239.

This proposition is so evident, that I need speak very few words towards the clearing of it.—Sharp, vol. iv. Ser. 5.

She [Mary] saw clearly in the Scriptures that she must work her own salvation with fear and trembling, and that she must not believe it by the faith of another, but according as things appeared to herself.—Burnet. Own Time, an. 1687.

But wise men, instead of looking above them, choose rather to look about them and within them, and by so doing keep their eyes always in their heads; and maintain a noble clearness in one and steadiness in the other.

South, vol. ii. Ser. 2.

The houses are all built in the wood between the sea and the mountains, and no more ground is cleared for each house, than just sufficient to prevent the dropping of the branches from rotting the thatch, with which they are covered.—Cook. Voyage, vol. i. b. i. c. 17.

When the smooth current of a limpid brook
The shepherd seeks, and plunging in its waves
The frighted innocents, their whitening robes
In the clear stream grow pure.—Dodsley. Agriculture, c. 3.

Every ship was subject to seizure for want of stamped clearances.—Burke. On a late State of the Nation.

We had scarcely trimmed our sails before it [the wind] came to east by north, which was right upon the reef, and consequently made our clearing it doubtful.

Cook. Voyage, vol. ii. b. iii. c. 8.

Others are furnished by criticism with a telescope. They see with great clearness whatever is too remote to be discovered by the rest of mankind, but are totally blind to all that lies immediately before them.—Rambler, No. 178.

CLEAVE, v. Dut. Kleven; Ger. Kleiben, kleben; A. S. Clyfian, cleofian, to stick to, to adhere.

Warner. Albion's England, b. vi. c. 31.

All ecclesiasticall persons or clergy-men may be considered in a three fold relation, first, to God; secondly, to the people; thirdly, one to another.

In respect to God, all are ministers, of what degree soever they be, because they do what they do by commission from him, either more or less immediate, in respect of the people all are bishops, that is, inspectors or overseers, as having charge to look unto them. But lastly, compared one to another, he whom we usually call bishop is only overseer of the rest.—Mede. Works, b. i. Disc. 5.

But give me leave to say, that, while so many orphans and widows of clergymen are destitute even of food and raiment, the eyes of the sons of the clergy should chiefly be turned on these objects, and the greatest share of their charity should flow in this channel.
Atterbury, vol. ii. Ser. 8.

The progress of the ecclesiastical authority gave birth to the memorable distinction of the laity and of the clergy, which had been unknown to the Greeks and Romans. The former of these appellations comprehended the body of the Christian people; the latter, according to the signification of the word, was appropriated to the chosen portion, that had been set apart for the service of religion.
Gibbon. Roman Empire, c. 15.

CLE'RICAL.
CLE'RICK, adj.
CLERK, n.
CLE'RKLY, ad.
CLE'RKSHIP.

From the Lat. Clericus. Brunne and Chaucer write Clergion. See CLERGY.

Cotgrave explains "Clergie, —learning, skill, science, clerkship:" because the clergy were distinguished for their learning. Blackstone observes, "that the judges were usually created out of the sacred order; and all the inferior offices were supplied by the lower clergy, which has occasioned their successors to be denominated clerks to this day," (Com. i. 17.)

Clerk is applied, generally, to—

One who is employed in learning, in learned occupations or in doing that, performing those offices, which require some learning or scholarship.

A clerk thoru enchantement hym bi gan to telle,
That the schulde first fader and moder quelle.
R. Gloucester, p. 10.

This clerk was cleped hendy Nicholas;
Of derne love he coude and of solas;
And therto he was slie and ful prive,
And like a maiden meke for to se.
Chaucer. The Millers Tale, v. 3199.

O genius mine owne clerke
Come forth, and here this man's shrifte.
Gower. Con. A. b. i.

Thei liue longe, and well thei ferde,
And clerkes, that this chance herde,
Thei writen it in eudence. Id. Ib.

And long after the apostles' times, all the people present did answer the priest, (he speaking in a language that they did understande) like as the clark or boy doth now answer (as he is taught) in a language that he vnderstands not.

They set forwarde a certayne doctoure of lawe, whiche should goe vnto Jesus with a clerkly question, that eyther he myght reproue hym of ignoraunce, or els he hymselfe beare awaye the prayse of learnyng.—Udal. Matt. c. 22.

For it appeareth in Prosper, that four bishops were excommunicated, anno 392, for being accusers of Priscillian (the first heretic who was confuted by steel,) that age conceiving all tendency to cruelty utterly inconsistent with clerical profession.—Fuller. Worthies. London Martyrs.

I cannot therefore subscribe to the counsel of Leonardus Lessius (abetting some ancient casuist, and pretended to be countenanced by some fathers) that it were meet for clericall and religious persons, rather to suffer death, than to kill a murderer.—Bp. Hall. Cases of Conscience.

Some clarks doe doubt in their deuiceful art,
Whether this heauenly thing, whereof I treat,
To wooten mercy, be of justice part,
Or drawne forth from her by diuine extreat.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. v. c. 10. s. 1.

I think good thoughts, while others write good words,
And, like unletter'd clerk, still cry Amen,
To every hymn that able spirit affords,
In polish'd form of well-refined pen.—Shakesp. s. 86.

When thus unto his will he fitly them had won,
At her expected hour the queen brought forth a son,
And to this great design, all happ'ning as he would,
He (his intended course that clerkly manage could)
Thus quaintly traine us on.—Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 19.

On the day of prorogation the bill ought to have been offered to the king: but the clerk of the crown, by the king's particular order withdrew the bill: which was a high offence in the clerk of the crown.

CLE'VERNESS.

Skinner conjectures from the Fr. Leger; Lat. Leviter. It may, by a common course of corruption, have been formed from the A. S. Ge-leaf-an, gleaf- cleaf-an, vivere, animare. Lye has Geleffast, animatus, animated, lively; and from this meaning, the word may have been applied to—

One who makes an active, alert, adroit, ready use of the means in his power; who handles his tools with skill, dexterity, and despatch. The word is not applied to the higher order of ability.

Cleverness is not uncommon in speech, but no instance has occurred in writing.

As clever Tom Clinch, while the rabble was bawling,
Rode stately through Holbourn to die in his calling,
He stop't at the George for a bottle of sack,
And promis'd to pay for it when he came back.
Swift. Clever Tom Clinch.

He [the Duke of Monmouth] gave the hangman but half the reward he intended; and said, if he cut off his head cleverly, and not so butcherly as he did Lord Russel's, his man should give him the rest.—Burnet. Own Time, an. 1685.

So I bought it, and paid for't, and boldly I say,
'Twas the best purchase made at Cadogan's that day.
The works the man wrote are the finest in nature,
And a most clever piece is his genuine portraiture.
Byron. On buying the Picture of Father Malebranche.

But no matter, I'll warrant we'll make up the party,
With two full as clever, and ten times as hearty.
Goldsmith. The Haunch of Venison.

Yet strange to tell! this wond'rous student lay
Snoring in bed for all the live long day;
Night was his time for labour—in a word,
Never was man so cleverly absurd.
Smart. The Horatian Canons of Friendship.

CLEW, v. } Dut. Kloowen, in globi formam
CLEW, n. } fila convolvere, to roll up (&c.) thread into a globular form, (Kilian.) A. S. Cleowe, cliwe, "Sphæra, any thing that is round, a sphear. It. Glomus, a clew or bottom of thread, a ball, pellet, or other like round thing," (Somner.) It is also written clue.

As the clue unwoven will serve for a guide, Beaumont and Fletcher have formed the verb, to clue; to guide, to direct.

But y^e comon fame tellyth y^t lastly the quene wane to her [Rosamond] by a clewe of threde, or sylke, and delte with her in suche maner, that she lyued not long after.
Fabyan, vol. i. c. 228.

What a fowle thing is it, to see a woman instead of her wool basket, to handle the table bourd, & for her spindle, the dice, for hir clewe or prayer booke, to turne the cards.
Vives. Instruction of a Christian Woman, b. i. c. 8.

If I were bashful, old, or dull, and sleepy
In love's allarmes, a woman might awake me,
Direct, and clew me out the way to happiness.
Beaum. & Fletch. Woman Pleased, Act ii. sc. 4.

Now therefore to wind up this clew of our discourse. If we be humble and meek-minded, if obedient to our spiritual guides, if charitable to our bretheren, if not too peremptory in our opinions, we have attained to a meet temper for the entertainment of Peace.—Bp. Hall. The Peace Maker, s. 13.

It suffices to have shown, that superficial and slight discoveries and observations that contain nothing of moment in themselves, nor serve as clues to lead us into farther knowledge, should not be thought worth our searching after.
Locke. Conduct of the Understanding, § 41.

This occasioned us to clew up our sails, and presently after six water-spouts were seen.—Cook. Voyage, b. i. c. 6.

The most skilful master can do little more than put the end of the clue into the hands of his scholar, by which he must conduct himself.—Sir J. Reynolds, Disc. 12.

CLICK, v. } CLI'CKET. } Click, Mr. Grose says, in Cumberland and Northumberland, is, to catch or snatch away. Lye, thinks from the A. S. Ge-leccan, prehendere, (whence to latch.) But Click and Cluket appear to have been merely applied to—

Any fastening, which was accompanied by a clicking, snapping noise. See To CLACK.

Hue hath a kaye and a clyketl. thauh the kynge slepe
And may lede yn wham hue loveth. as hure luf lyketh.
Piers Ploughman, p. 124.

So worth thow dryven out as deuh. (deul?) and the dore closed.
Ykeyed and yclykeded. Id. p. 123.

This freshe May, of which I spake of yore,
In warm wex hath enprented the cliket,
That January bare of the smal wiket,
By which into his gardin oft he went.
Chaucer. The Marchantes Tale, v. 9991.

Thy thoughts are ours, in all, and we but prov'd
Their voyce, in our designs, which by assenting
Hath more confirm'd us, than if heartning Jove
Had, from his hundred statues, bid us strike,
And at the stroke clickt all his marble thumbs.
B Jonson. Sejanus, Act ii.

——— Cannot you cliket
Without a fee, or when she has a suit
For you to grant?—Massinger. The Picture, Act iii. sc. 4.

The solemn death-watch click'd the hour she dy'd,
And shrilling crickets in the chimney cry'd.
Gay, Pastoral 5.

CLI'ENT, n. } CLIE'NTAL. } CLIE'NTELARY, adj. } CLI'ENTED, adj. } CLI'ENTELE, n. } CLI'ENTSHIP. } Fr. Client; It. and Sp. Cliente; Lat. Cliens; from Gr. Κλειειν, celebrare, honorare, because a client is one who honours another as his patron. Martinius. (Qui eum colebat.) "Fr. Client,—

A client or suitor; a nobleman's retainer or follower, the scope of whose attendance or duty is to be protected." It is now used as—

A correlative to counsellor, lawyer, or advocate; viz. as the suitor, who employs the counsellor, lawyer, or advocate.

How that clyentes a corde. Mede a counteth lytel.
Piers Ploughman, p. 58.

For whom that loue hath vnder cure,
As he is blynde hym selfe, right so
He maketh his client blynde also.—Gower. Con. A. b. iii.

Furthermore, he made a difference between the chiefer citizens, and the baser people, by calling the better sort Patrons, as much to say, as defenders: and the meanest sort Clientes, as you would say, followers, or men protected. The patrons did help the clients to their right.
North. Plutarch, p. 21.

The prince being at Bruxels, humbly besought hys majestie to pitie the miserie of hys poore subjects: who by his suite gat of the emperour, for his clientes, wordes without hope.—R. Ascham. Works, p. 21.

This due occasion of discouragement, the worst conditioned and least clented petitioners, do yet, vnder the sweet baite of revenge, convert to a more plentiful prosecution of actions.—Carew. Survey of Cornwall, fol. 4.

But to speak ingenuously, those of the Roman clientele are not more careful and punctual in seaning, and observing the rules and practice of their espousals, than ours here are incurious of both.—Bp. Hall. Cases of Cons. Dec. 4. Case 6.

Yet so as the clientelary right be alwayes retained.
Prynne. Power of Parliaments, Appendix, p. 167.

Never did any client, with so much scruple and solicitousness, enquire of his counsel about the strength or weakness of his title, when he was to go to law for all his estate, and to see his own fortune canvassed at the bar: as a man in this condition will dispute his title to heaven, and argue his several doubts and misgivings with his spiritual guide or confessor.—South, vol. viii. Ser. 3.

You are acquainted with the Roman history, and know without any information, that patronage and clientship always descended from the fathers to the sons; and that the same plebeian houses had recourse to the same patrician line, which had formerly protected them, and followed their principles and fortunes to the last; so that I am your lordship's by descent, and part of your inheritance.
Dryden. Virgil. Pastorals, Ded.

O that the voice of clamour and debate,
That pleads for peace till it disturbs the state,
Were hush'd in favour of thy generous plea,
The poor thy clients, and heav'n smile thy fee!
Cowper. Charity.

In the time of the commonwealth, those who lived in a dependent and cliental relation on the great men, used frequently to shew marks of acknowledgment by considerable bequests at their deaths.
Burke. Abridgement of English History, an. 51.

CLIFF, or CLIFT. } CLI'FFY. } CLI'FTED. } Dut. Klif; Ger. Klippe, Kluft; Sw. Klift. Cliff (also written cleves or cleeves, or clives,) is the past part. of the verb, to cleave, (qv.) See the quotation from Verstegan.

Cleaved, cleav'd, cleft, or clift.

This ladie rometh by the cliffe to plaie
With her meine.—Chaucer. Of Hypsiphile & Medea.

Whome foreeth he by surge of seas
Into Charybdis clives?
Or whome doth Neptune most disease?
Or whom to Scylla drives?
Turberville. A Myrrour of the Fall of Pride.

In our ancient language the cut off or broken mountaines on the sea sides, are more rightly, and properly called cliffs, than by the name of rocks or hils: that appellation being more fitting unto the inland mountaines—but the name of cliff comming from our verbe to cleave, is unto those more aptly given, for that they seeme unto our view as cleft or cloven, from the part that sometime belonged unto them.
Verstegan. Restitution of Decayed Intelligence, c. 4.

Some, his ill-season'd mouth that wisely understood,
Rob Dover's neighbouring cleeves of sampyre, to excite
His dull and sickly taste, and stir up appetite.
Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 18.

But what availes, to striue against the tide,
Or else to driue against the streame and winde?
What booteth it against the clives to ride,
Or else to worke against the course of kind?
Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 15.

Regard would be had in this case, as well that the cleft of the stocke gape not too much (as being over wide for the graffe;) as that it bee not too little and over-streight, for feare that either it flurt it out againe, or elaspe it and gird it so hard that it kill it quite.—Holland. Plinie, b. xvii. c. 14.

The rest was craggie cliff, that overhung
Still as it rose, impossible to climbe.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. iv.

And opposite to famous Kent do lie
The pleasant fields of flow'ry Picardy,
Where our fair Calais, walled in her sands,
In kenning of the cliffy Dover stands.
Drayton. The French Queen to the Duke of Suffolk.

There lies a certain island in the sea,
'Twixt rockie Samos and rough Ithaca,
That cliffie is itselfe, and nothing great.
Chapman. Homer. Odyssey, b. iv.

As high steep cliffs bounding on the sea have this ill consequence, that they seldom afford anchoring: so they have this benefit, that we can see them far off, and sail close to them without danger; for which reason we call them Bold Shores.—Dampier. Voyage, an. 1687.

Gon. The swarming populace spread every wall,
And cling as if with claws they did enforce
Their hold thro' clifted stones.
Congreve. Mourning Bride, Act i.

Where he, who thinks, with rapture blind,
This hallow'd work for him design'd?
High on some cliff, to heaven up pil'd,
Of rude access, of prospect wild,
Where, tangled round the jealous steep,
Strange shades o'erbrow the valleys deep.
Collins. Ode on the Poetical Character.

It shews a steep rocky cliff next the sea, and off the very point there are some rocks like spires.
Cook. Voyage, vol. vi. c. 10.

O Solitude, romantic maid,
Whether by nodding towers you tread,
Or climb the Andes' clifted side,
Or by the Nile's coy source abide.
Grainger. Solitude. An Ode.

CLIMA'CTER, n. } CLIMA'CTER, v. } CLIMACTE'RICK, adj. } CLIMACTE'RICK, n. } CLIMACTE'RICAL. } It. Climaterico; Sp. Climaterico; Gr. Κλιμακτηρ, from Κλιμαξ, scale, gradation. Cotgrave says, "Climactere; every seventh, or ninth, or the sixty-third years of a man's life, all very dangerous, but the last, most." See the quotation from Plinie.

Death might have taken such, her end deferr'd,
Until the time she had been climacter'd.
When she would have been at threescore years and three,
Such as our best at three-and twenty be.
Drayton. On the Death of Lady Clifton.

Our lion's climacteric now is past,
And crown'd with bays he ramp'eth free at last
Drummond. The Speech of Caledonia.

Thus much they say, that the fewer sort of men live any long time; for that the greatest number by farre, have their nativitie incident and liable to the daungerous houres and times either of the moone's occurrence (as in her quadrature, opposition, and sextile aspect) or of daies according to the number of seven or nine (which are daily and nightly marked and observed) whereupon ensueth the rule of the dangerous graduall yeeres called climactericke.
Holland. Plinie, b. vii. c. 49.

——— I can tell him,
Truer than all the physicians in the world,
He cannot live out to-morrow; this
Is the most certain climacterical year—
'Tis past all danger, for there's no escaping it.
What age is your mother, sir?
Sim. Faith, near her days too;
Wants some two of threescore.
Massinger. The Old Law, Act i. sc. 1.

And therefore the consent of elder times, setling their conceits upon climacters not onely differing from this of ours but one another; though several nations and ages do fancy unto themselves different years of danger, yet every one expects the same event, and constant verity in each.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iv. c. 12.

I have not known, and I am now past my grand climacterick, being sixty four years of age, according to my way of life, or rather (if you will allow punning in an old gentleman) according to my way of pastime; I say, as old as I am, I have not been acquainted with many of the Greenhats.
Tatler, No. 59.

He [Sir Thomas Smith] departed this mortal life in the climacterical year of his age, in the month of July 1577, and was buried in the church of Theydon Mount, or Theydon at Mount in Essex.—Wood. Athenæ Oxon.

The fear of death is truly wise,
Till wisdom can rise higher:
And, arm'd with pious fortitude,
Death, dreaded once, desire:
Grand climacteric vanities
The vainest will despise;
Shock'd, when beneath the snow of age
Man immaturely dies.—Young. Resignation, pt. ii.

These gentlemen deal in regeneration; but at any price I should hardly yield my rigid fibres to be regenerated by them; nor begin, in my grand climacterick, to squall in their new accents, or to stammer, in my second cradle, the elemental sounds of their barbarous metaphysicks.
Burke. Reflections on the French Revolution.

I never go home abruptly because a snake crosses my way, nor have any particular dread of a climacterical year: yet I confess that, with all my scorn of old women, and their tales, I consider it as an unhappy day, when I happen to be greeted in the morning, by Suspirius the screech owl.
Rambler, No. 139.

CLI'MATE, v. } CLI'MATE, n. } CLI'MATURE. } CLIME, n. } Fr. Climat; It. Clima; Sp. Clima; Gr. Κλιμα; Lat. Clima, inclinatio, seu declinatio cœli, from Κλινειν, to incline, or bend. Properly applied to—

Regions which differ in temperature from others. The verb is used in Shakespeare: "Whilst you do climate here," i. e. while you stay, remain or dwell in this climate.

Astronomyens al so aren at ere whittes end
Of that was calculed of the clymat. the contrarye the y fyndeth.
Piers Ploughman, p. 291.

For euery climat hath his dele
After the tournyng of the whele,
Whiche blinde fortune ouerthroweth,
Whereof the certaine no man knoweth.
Gower. Con. A. Prologue.

Whereby it seemeth this blackness proceedeth rather of some natural infection of that man, which was so strong, that neither the nature of the clime, neither the good complexion of the mother concurring, coulde any thinge alter, and therefore wee cannot impute it to the nature of the clime.—Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. iii. p. 52.

Leo. The blessed Gods
Purge all infection from our ayre, whilest you
Doe clymate here.—Shakes. Winter's Tale, Act v. sc. 1.

——— O flours,
That never will in other climate grow,
My early visitation, and my last
At ev'n, which I bred up with tender hand
From the first op'ning bud, and gave ye names.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. xi.

—— It is the place
My fate appoints me; and the region where
I must, whatever happens, there embrace.
Disturbance, travail, labour, hope, and fear,
Are of that clime, engender'd in that place.
Daniel. The Civil Wars, b. viii.

—— (His spear)
He walkt with to support uneasie steps
Over the burning marle, not like those steps
On heavens azure, and the torrid clime
Smote on him sore besides, vaulted with fire.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. i.

He said he thought that was the best climate, where he could be abroad in the air with pleasure, or at least without trouble or inconvenience, the most days of the year, and the most hours of the day; and this he thought he could be in England, more than any other country he knew of in Europe.—Sir W. Temple. Of Gardening.

A race unconquer'd, by their clime made bold,
The Caledonians, arm'd with want and cold,
Have, by a fate indulgent to your fame,
Been from all ages kept for you to tame.
Waller. To my Lord Protector.

By physical causes, I mean those qualities of the air and climate, which are supposed to work insensibly on the temper, by altering the tone and habit of the body, and giving a particular complexion which though reflection and reason may sometimes overcome it, will yet prevail among the generality of mankind, and have an influence on their manners.—Hume. Ess. Of National Character.

My soul, turn from them, turn we to survey
Where rougher climes a nobler race display,
Where the bleak Swiss their stormy mansions tread,
And force a churlish soil for scanty bread.
Goldsmith. The Traveller.

CLI'MAX. Gr. Κλιμαξ, scala, gradus, from Κλινειν, to bend, or incline. Gradatio, quæ dicitur climax, (Quint. ix. iii. 54.)

A scale, a gradation (sc.) of ascent. See the example from Blair.

Atheism therefore, that bugbear of women and fools, is the very top and perfection of free-thinking. It is the grand arcanum to which a true genius naturally riseth, by a certain climax or gradation of thought, and without which he can never possess his soul in absolute liberty and repose.
Bp. Berkeley. Minute Philosopher, Dial. 1.

A fourth rule, for constructing sentences with proper strength, is, to make the members of them go on rising and growing in their importance above one another. This sort of arrangement is called a climax and is always considered as a beauty in composition.
Blair. On Rhetoric and Belles Lettres, Lec. 12.

CLIMB, v. } A. S. Climan; Dut. Klemmen, klimmen; Ger. Klimmen, scandere. Wachter adds, perhaps from Κλιμα, gradus, vel hoc ab illo.
CLI'MBING, n.

To mount or ascend; and particularly, to ascend by clinging or holding fast.

Climber, the v. now written Clamber, (qv.)

And suththe he wende to Oxenford, to the abbeie of Oseneye,
And there clerkes made climbe scandel heye.
R. Gloucester, p. 527.

Anon he het elde. an hih for to clymbe
And shaken hit sharpliche, the ripen sholden falle;
Elde clam towarde the crop.—Piers Ploughman, p. 316.

And whan they were all on an hepe,
Tho behind gonne vp lepe
And clambes vp on other fast.
Chaucer. House of Fame, b. iii.

How that thei clymbe vpon the whele,
And whan they wene all shall be wele,
Thei ben downe throwe at laste.—Gower. Con. A. b. ii.

The vsurping of authoritie, and taking in hande of rule which is the sitting in God's seat of iustice, and a proude clyming vp into God's high throne, must needes be not onely cursed newly by him, but also hath bene often punished afore of him.—Sir J. Cheke. The Hurt of Sedition.

Beware how ye climber for breaking your neck.—Tuster.

For, both the boughes doe laughing blossome beare,
And with fresh colours deck the wanton prime,
And eke attonce the heavy trees they clime,
Which seeme to labour vnder their fruites lode.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. iii. c. 6.

So clomb this first grand thief into God's fould:
So since into his church lewd hirelings climbe.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. iv.

That looking downe whence lately I was cloame,
Danger bid feare if further I should roame.
Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 534.

For now another springing pow'r is seen,
Whereto (as to the new arising sun)
All turn their faces, leaving those low rays
Of setting fortune, which no climer weighs.
Daniel. The Civil Wars, b. vii.

But heere now behold how steadie the state
Of climbers aloft is aboue their degree,
And how they do fall from fortune to fate,
Example are such as my fellow and me.
Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 82.

The hardy Switzer now so far was gone,
That halfe way vp with mickle paine he got,
A thousand weapons he sustain'd alone,
And his audacious climbing ceased not.
Fairefax. Godfrey of Bovlogne, b. xi. s. 35.

Its hooked form is of great use to the rapacious kind, in catching and holding their prey, and in the comminution thereof by tearing; to others it [the mouth] is no less serviceable to their climbing, as well as neat and nice comminution of their food.—Derham. Physico-Theology, c. 21.

—— Methinks I see him
Climb the aerial heights, and glide along
Athwart the sev'ring clouds: but the faint eye,
Flung backward in the chase, soon drops its hold,
Disabled quite, and jaded with pursuing.—Blair. Grave.

Mr. Banks and Doctor Solander were several times on shore, during the last two or three days, not without success, but greatly circumscribed in their walks by climbers of a most luxuriant growth, which were so interwoven together, as to fill up the space between the trees about which they grew, and render the woods altogether impassable.
Cook. Voyage, vol. i. b. ii. c. 6.

CLINCH, v. or CLENCH. } In Ger. Lenken, is, flectere, vertere; and in Lye is found A. S. Ge-hlenced, tortus; which by a common process of corruption would become, glenced, clenced, clenched.
CLI'NCHER.

A nail is not clenched, unless it passes through, and is then bent, turned or twisted back.

To clench the hand is to bend the fingers inward to the palm. And, consequentially, to clench or clinch is—

To fasten or fix, to confirm, to strengthen, to corroborate.

Clench, the noun, is applied to a species of a wit; which Dryden perhaps intends to describe, "as wresting and torturing a word into another meaning."

With clinching clawes there came and talents sharplie set,
A flock of greedie griping woes
my grunting heart to fret.—Turberville. To his Love.

Secondly, every predominant affection in mens soule, like the ivy, doth compasse and confine all humane actions and counsells; neither can you finde any thing so immaculate and inconcern'd, which affections have not tainted and clinched as it were with their tendrells.
Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, p. 129.

It is seldome seen, that the clinch-fist of logick (good to knock a man down at a blow) can so open itself as to smoth and stroak one with the palme thereof.
Fuller. Worthies. Chester.

Yet this I'll say, for th' honour of the place,
That, by God a extraordinary grace
(Which shows the people have judgment, if not wit,)
The land is undefil'd with clinchers yet.
Cowley. Answer to Verses sent me to Jersey.

And in an instant, upon some word of provocation [I saw him] throw off his hat and periwig, clinch his fist, and strike the fellow a slap in the face; at the same time calling him a rascal, and telling him he was a gentleman's son.
Tatler. No. 202.

But the council of Trent goes much farther, and clincheth the business as effectually as possible.—South, vol. vii. Ser. 7.

I ask you if one of them does not perpetually pay us with clenches upon words and a certain clownish kind of raillery? If now and then he does not offer at a catechresis or Clevelandism, wresting and torturing a word into another meaning.—Dryden. Essay on Dramatic Poesie.

I cannot say he [Shakespeare] is every where alike; were he so, I should do him injury to compare him with the greatest of mankind. He is many times flat, insipid, his comick wit degenerating into clenches, his serious swelling into bombast.—Id. Ib.

To which (if you will pardon me a clinch) I shall add, as to the disease last named [the stone] so cruel in its tortures, and so fatal in its catastrophe, that they must have their hearts more hard than a very stone, that can refuse a sanative remedy for the stone.—Boyle. Life. Let. to Mr. Hartlib.

(The wimbles for the work Calypso found)
With those he pierc'd them, and with clinchers bound.
Pope. Homer. Odyssey, b. v.

This is one of his [Rubens's] most careful pictures; the characters are of a higher style of beauty than usual, particularly the Mary Magdalen, weeping, with her hand clenched.
Sir J. Reynolds. Journey to Flanders and Holland.

I wish the controversy to rest where it does, though I applaud Mr. Marsh's courage in professing his readiness to continue the combat, and am persuaded, that, if he is obliged to strike a last blow, it will be a clincher.
Anecdotes of Bp. Watson. Let. Oct. 1804.

CLING, v. A. S. "Cling-an, marcere, to wither, to pine, to faint; to cling or shrink up, (Somner.) Piers Ploughman says, "When thou clingest for droughth." (See in v. CLAM.) The more usual application now, is—

To cling or shrink up, as a loose vest, driven by the wind, round the limbs; to cleave or adhere, to hold fast round, to entwine, enfold, or embrace.

Mr. Steevens has furnished a number of passages, for the use, he says, of the future lexicographer, all of which come within the explanation of Somner, or the consequential—to entwine, enfold, embrace. And see Clung, in Dr. Jamieson.

All knew me; cling'd about me, and a cry
Of pleasing mourning, flew about so hie,
The horrid roofe resounded, and the queene
Herselfe, was mou'd, to see our kind so keene.
Chapman. Homer. Odyssey, b. x.

But I have better counsel to give the prelates, and far more acceptable to their ears; this advice for them in my opinion is fitter for them: cling fast to your pontifical sees, bate not, quit yourselves like barons, stand to the utmost for your haughty courts and votes in parliament.
Milton. The Reason of Church Government, b. i. c. 6.

The footmen then, wanting defence on their flanks, stood in plumps with their companies so thrust and thronged together, as if they had beene clinged, not one of them could either draw his sword or bring backe his hand.
Holland. Ammianus, p. 423.

Mach. —— If thou speak'st falce,
Upon the next tree shalt thou hang alive,
Till famine cling thee.—Shakes. Macbeth, Act v. sc. 3.

His visage drawn he felt to sharp and spare,
His armes clung to his ribs.—Milton. Paradise Lost, b. x.

As trees are by the bark embrac'd,
Love to my soul doth cling.—Rochester. Alexis & Strephon.

The disposing of the drapery, so as to appear to cling close round the limbs, is a kind of pedantry, which young painters are very apt to fall into, as it carries with it a relish of the learning acquired from the ancient statues; but they should recollect there is not the same necessity for this practice in painting as in sculpture.
Sir J. Reynolds, Note 30. On the Art of Painting.

Even dogs assail'd their masters, all save one,
And he was faithful to a corse, and kept
The birds and beasts and famish'd men at bay,
Till hunger clung them, or the dropping dead
Lured their lank jaws. Lord Byron. Darkness.

CLI'NICK, adj. } Gr. Κλιν-ειν, to bend, to CLI'NICK, s. } lay down.

One who lies down; one confined to his bed. Applied, in ecclesiastical history, to—

Those who receive baptism on their death-beds.

And that this also descended lower, we have the testimony of S. James who advises the sick person to send for the Elders of the Church, that they may pray over him; that they may anoint him, that in that society there may be confession of sins by the clinick or sick person, and that after these preparatives, and in this ministry, his sins may be forgiven him.
Bp. Taylor. Sermons. Of the Office Ministerial.

[Prayers] are intended to be a suppletory to the imperfections of other acts; and by that reason are the proper and most pertinent imployment of a clinic or death bed penitent.
Id. Holy Dying, s. 6. c. 4.

CLINK, v. } Ger. Klingen; Dut. Klinghen, klincken, tinnire. See CLANG.
CLINK, n.
CLI'NCANT.

Clink, by Spenser, seems to be used as clicket, (qv.) Clinquant, in Shakespeare, for the gingling noise of the ornaments. And by Feltham, in the same manner.

And therfore, hoste, I warne the beforne,
My joly body shal a tale telle,
And I shal clinken you so mery a belle,
That I shal waken all this compagnie.
Chaucer. The Shipmannes Prologue, v. 12,[illegible]C.

For sikerly, n'ere clinking of your belles,
That on your bridel hange on every side,
By heven king, that for us alle dide,
I shuld er this have fallen doun for slepe.
Id. The Nonnes Preestes Tale, v. 14,500.

—— Such battering beating through the chinks
Far rendring answers ryng, & yngot gaddes with clashing cinks,
In blustrying forges blowne.
Phaer. Virgil. Æneidos, b. viii.

There tyrannise vpon the soules you finde
Condemn'd to woe, and double still their paines,
Where some complaine, where some their teeth doe grinde,
Some howle, some weepe, some clinke their iron chaines.
Fairefax. Godfrey of Boulogne, b. ix. s. 65.

Well heard Kiddie all this sore constraint:
And leng'd to know the cause of his complaint:
Tho' creeping close, behind the wicket's clinke,
Priuily he peeped out through a chinke:
Yet not so priuily but the fox him spied,
For deceitfull meaning is double-eyed.
Spenser. Shepherd's Calendar. May.

If therefore we did not believe, truth and honour and justice were to be preferr'd before this present life, and all those elincant sparlings, that dance and dangle in the rayes and jubilations of it, sure we should not be so sottish, as to chuse the first, and let the latter slip away disdained.
Feltham, pt. ii. Res. 56.

——— To day the French
All clinquant, all in gold, like heathen gods
Shone downe the English.—Shakes. Hen. VIII. Act i. sc. 1.

Good housewives all the winter's rage despise,
Defended by the riding-hood's disguise:
Or, underneath the umbrella's oily shed,
Safe through the wet on clinking pattens tread.
Gay. Trivia, b. i.

And when the measur'd couplets curse
The manacles of Gothic verse,
While the trim bard, in easy strains,
Talks much of fetters, clogs, and chains;
He only aims that you should think,
How charmingly he makes them clink.—Lloyd. On Rhyme.

CLIP, v. } "A. S. Clyppan, amplecti, complecti, to embrace, to clipp, to take and hug in his armes," (Somner.)
CLIP, s.

He kisseth hire, and clippeth hire ful oft.
Chaucer. The Marchantes Tale, v. 10,287.

Neuertheless for this time you must sende them as you may get them if you couldo finde the meanes that the haire might bee clipped off them, they wouldo not take so much roome in the shippes as they doe.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 306.

What misery was in the lyfe of Dyonise the tyrant of Cecile! who knowing, that his people desired his distruction, for his rau n and cruelte, wolde nat be of any man shaven, but strate caused his owne daughters to cluppe his bearde
Sir T. Elyot. Governor, b. ii. c. 9.

But [love] finding these north climes do coldly him embrace,
Not used to frozen clips, he strave to find some part,
Where, with most ease and warmth, he might employ his dart.—Stanley. Astrophel & Stella.

Then kissing may be plide
and clipping put in ure,
And lingred sores by Cupid's salues
aspire to quick recure.
Turbervile. The Ventrous Lover.

The trees grow up, and mix together freely,
The oaks not envious of the falling cedar,
The lustie vine not jealous of the ivie
Because she clips the elm.
Beaum. & Fletch. The Lover's Progress, Act i. sc. 1.

The coyne was so clipped, that it was thought good to change the same, and to make it baser.
Stow. Hen. III an. 1247.

The Hernike bring news that the Volscians and Aequians for all their wings were well clipped, and their forces greatly deceased, began to gather and leavie new armies.
Holland. Livie, p. 93.

So might the little baby clip the nurse,
And it content, she never a wit the worse.
Drayton. The French Queen. To the Duke of Suffolk.

Also about this time a parliament was holden at London, in the which it was ordered that the English grote should be coyned of certaine weight and of the one side the king's picture, and on the other side a crosse as large fully as the grote, to aduoyd clippyng.—Grafton. Hen. III. an. 11.

Yet surely it concerns us so to discourse of these points in general, as neither to clip the divine prerogative, nor yet, on the other hand, to tie up the creature, so as to undermine duty by taking away the energy of precepts, threatnings, and exhortations.—South, vol. v. Ser. 5.

Clipping by Englishmen is robbing the honest man who receives clipp'd money, and transferring the silver, i. e. the value is pared off from it into the clipper's pocket.
Locke. Farther Consid. concerning the Value of Money.

To clip our pinions let them try,
Not having heart themselves to fly.
Churchill. The Ghost, b. iii.

CLISH-CLASH. Clash-clash. See CLASH.

The drums went downe—dun downe, the flutes flt—flte—flt—flte,
The weapons clish-clash and the captaines now—now—now.—Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 481.

CLOAK, v. } Skinner supposes from the A. S. Lack, clidamys, a kind of garment. The A. S. Ge-laccan is, comprehendere, to contain; and may give, by corruption, Ge-lacced, glacced, clacced, cloaked, cloak.
CLO'AKEDLY.
CLOAK-INGS.
CLOAK-LESS.

To enfold, to enwrap, and thus, (lit. and met.) to cover, to conceal.

Ful fetise was hire cloke as I was ware.
Chaucer. The Prologue, v. 157.

He [Erasmus] hath tryed oute the refuse that cleued in anye the woorkes of suche as wrote whan the doctrine beegaune by patchyng and clokyng to declyne to insyncerities.
Udal. Preface, p. 17.

The doctrine which we shal entreate in this place, is playne ynough and easie, sauing that the greatest parte of those that profess them selues to be Christians, do seke oute and bring, I can not tell what subtelties to cloke theyr euill withall.—Calvine. Foure Godlye Sermons, Ser. 1.

And for that there may be no such priuie person passe vnder the cloke and colour of mariner, you shall vpon the weighing of your ship's anker, call the master and the mariners within boord by their names.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 273.

The French ambassador came to declare, first how the emperor wronged divers of his master's subjects and vassals; arrested also his merchants, and did cloke-dy begin war, for he besieged Mirandola round about with forces he had made in the French king's country
Burnet. Records. King Edward's Journal.

Suche men had nede to take hede of their dissemblings and clokinge; for it will once be espied. I meane, when our Christe shall come in his glorye, which I truste will be shortely.—Strype. Rec. No. 30. Epistle by Mr. Latimer.

The skies gan scowle, o'ercast with misty clowdes,
When (as I rode alone by London waye, Clokelesse, vnclad) thus did I sing and say.
Gascoigne. Introd. to the Psalm De profundis.

There-to when needed, she would weepe and pray:
And when her listed, she could fawne and flatter;
Now smiling smoothly, like to sommer's day,
Now glooming sadly, so to cloke her matter.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. vi. c. 6.

And as to suffer your people to passe out of the citie through my campe, no, no, I will not so accomplishe your cloked request, but you shall kepe them still to spend your victualles.—Grafton. Hen. V. an. 7.

Of these two, I confesse it harder to manage prosperity, and to avoid hurt from good: strong and cold winds doe but make us gather up our cloake more round, more close: but to keep it about us in a hot sun-shine; to run, and not sweat; to sweat and not faint; how difficult it is!
Bp. Hall, Epistles. Dec. 4. Ep. 1.

In the mean time the drummer, the captain's equipage, was very loud, that none of the captain's things should be placed so as to be spoiled; upon which his cloak-bag was fixed in the seat of the coach.—Spectator, No. 132.

Amongst the articles, which they brought to barter this day, we could not help taking notice of a particular sort of cloak and cap, which, even in countries where dress is more particularly attended to, might be reckon'd elegant.
Cook. Voyage, vol. vi. b. iii. c. 11.

CLOCK, v. } "A. S. Clocean, glocire, glocitare, singultire, bombum sive sonitum edere.
CLO'CKING, s.

To clock or cluck like a hen; to sigh, to sob, to give a sound like to that of a vessel with a narrow mouth," (Somner.) See CLACK and CLICK.

A clock is also a time-piece or chronometer, so called because it clicketh.

——— For ich am knowen,
Ther connynge clerkus. shalleth clocke by hynde.
Piers Ploukman, p. 39.

Wel sikerer was his crowing in his logge,
Than is a clok, or any abbey orloge.
Chaucer. The Nonnes Preestes Tale, v. 13,360.

The hen clocketh her chickens, feedeth them, and keepeth them from the kite. Women must clocke their children, bring them up well, and keepe them from euill happ.
Wilson. The Arte of Rhetorike, p. 194.

Others [chickens] they suffer to mount upon their backs, gently giving them leave to climbe and get up on every side, and this they do not without great joy and contentment, which they testifie by a kind of clocking and speciall noise that they make at such a time.
Holland. Plutarch, p. 180.

Of every tedious hour you have made two,
All this long winter here, by missing you:
Minutes are months, and when the hour is past,
A year is ended since the clock struck last.
Drayton. Of his Lady's not coming to London.

After him Saulanus succeeded being the 63 pope, he commaunded clockes & dyals to be set up in churches, to distinguish the houres of the day.
Stow. Brytaines & Saxons, an. 606.

The great engine to effect this, was by engaging men of several callings (and those the meaner still the better) to hold forth, and harangue the multitude, sometimes in streets, sometimes in churches, sometimes in barns, sometimes from pulpits, sometimes from tubs; and in a word, wheresoever, and howsoever they could clock the senseless and unthinking rabble about them.—South, vol. iv. Ser. 1.

The common hen, all the while she is broody, sits, and leads her chickens, uses a voice which we call clocking.
Ray. On the Creation, pt. i.

So, if unprejudic'd you scan
The goings of this clock-work man,
You find a hundred movements made
By fine devices in his head;
But 'tis the stomach's solid stroke
That tells his being what's o'clock.—Prior. Alma, c. 3.

By the slow clock, in stately measur'd chime,
That from the massy tower tremendous toll'd,
No more the plowman counts the tedious time,
Nor distant shepherd pens his twilight fold
Warton, Ode 3.

CLOD, v. } Dut. Klotteren, coagulare; klotte, gleba, massa. It is perhaps from the A. S. Cleof-an, to cleave; formed thus, past part. Cloven, cloved, clov'd, clod, or clot. See CLOT.
CLOD, s.
CLO'DDY.
CLOD-POLE, or CLOT-POLE.

A lump or mass cleaved, or separated from a larger mass, or material substance.

To clod,—to form into lumps or masses—cleaved or separated from a larger mass: also, as in Holland, to break the clods or lumps.

A clod-pole,—a block-head; a lumpish head.

The grounde must be plowed, the cloddes must be broken with the harowe, the fellde must be dunged, the seede must be sowen, &c.—Udal. John, c. 4.

And sure they be that within short time doth shall stop theyr eares, and the cloddes keuer all the mouthes yt praise the.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 83.

For this ghospel is the same treasur hidden under ye cloddy hard greunde in the field of the letter, which your grace after ye had found, did for loye sell all that ye had to bye that same fielde withall.—Udal. Luke, Pref.

After the second fallow called stirring, done with crosse and overthwart furrow to the first: then followeth clodding, if need be, either with rakes or great harrowes.
Holland. Plinie, b. xviii. c. 20.

Dread Lord of spirits, well thou didst devise
To fling the world's rude dunghill, and the dross
Of the old chaos, farthest from the skies,
And thine own seat, that here the child of loss,
Of all the lower heav'n, the curse, and cross,
That wretch, beast, captive, monster man, might spend,
(Proud of the mire in which his soul is pen'd)
Clodded in lumps of clay, his weary life to end.
G. Fletcher. Christ's Victory in Heaven.

That Christian theefe (quoth he) that was so bold
To combat me in hard and single fight,
Shall wounded fall inglorious on the mold,
His locks with clods of bloud and dust bedight.
Fairefax. Godfrey of Boulogne, b. vii. s. 54.

So a small seed that in the earth lies hid,
And dies, reviving bursts her cloddy side,
Adorn'd with yellow locks anew is born,
And doth become a mother great with corn.
Drummond. Flowers of Sion.

Gui. Where's my brother?
I have sent Cloten's clot-pole downe the streame
In embassie to his mother; his bodie's hostage
For his returne. Shakespeare. Cymbeline, Act iv. sc. 2.

And then reflect, that this is the glory, to which we clods of earth are called and invited, yea and (hear, O heaven; and give ear, O earth!) wooed to accept.
Bp. Bull, vol. i. Ser. 9.

How great (while yet we tread the kindred clod,
And every moment fear to sink beneath
The clod we tread: soon trodden by our sons)
How great, in the wild whirl of time's pursuits,
To stop and pause.—Young. The Complaint, Night 6.

CLOG, v. CLOG, n. CLO'GGING, n. CLO'GGY. } Skinner thinks, perhaps from Log, truncus. It may be from the Goth. Lag-yan; A. S. Lecgan, ge-lecgan, ponere, to lay. The past part. lagged, ge-lagged: lag, (a broad.) ge-lag, would give log and gelog, glog, clog; aliquid impositum, any thing imposed: as a load, (from the same A. S. verb,) log, or clog.

To clog, then, is to load, to burthen; and is so used without any subaudition by Ray. It is now generally used with a subaudition of hinderance or obstruction; and thus, consequentially, to clog, is—

To hinder, obstruct, impede, embarrass, or encumber.

The man for murther caught and clogde with yron colde,
To sweare that he more happie is
than louers may be holde.
Turbervile. Of the Torments of Hell, &c.

And what shall ye be at length the better for this turmoyle, which beside diuers other incommodities rehearsed, shall be thus clogged with the vnsufferable burden of the martiall lawe.—Sir J. Cheeke. The Hurt of Sedition.

And of these newes I fele no weale nor woe;
Save that a clogge doth hang yet at my hele.
Wyat. Of the Courtier's Life.

He [St. Paul] meaneth nothing else, but considering the Gospel then required speedie preachers, and that it were a clogge to be maried, and somewhat an hinderaunce to those should trauaile, he thought it expedient to forbeare.
Wilson. The Arte of Logike.

Hence, I say, the habituate believer need not suspect his estate if he find not in himself such an extremity of violent grief and humiliation, as he observes in others, knowing, that in him such a measure of teares would both soil the face of his devotion, and clog the exercise of it.
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 655.

I did but prompt the age to quit their clogs
By the known rules of antient liberty,
When strait a barbarous noise environs me
Of owls and cuckoos, asses, apes, and dogs.
Milton, Son. 12.

For there, they're mixt, soil'd and contaminate,
But truth doth clear, unweave, and simplifie,
Search, sever, pierce, open, and disgregate
All ascititious cloggings.—More. On the Soul, pt. ii. b. ii. c. 3.

We see clocks and jacks, though the teeth of the wheels and nuts be never so smooth and polished, yet if they be not oyl'd will hardly move, though you clog them with never so much weight.—Ray. On the Creation, pt. ii.

It was said, that the king was alienated from the Church of England, and weary of supporting episcopacy in Scotland; and so was resolved not to clog his government any longer with it.—Burnet. Own Time, an. 1670.

If any leisure time he had from power,
Because 'tis sin to misemploy an hour,
His business was, by writing to persuade
That kings were useless, and a clog to trade.
Dryden. Absalom & Achitophel.

[It is likely] that by additaments of some such nature, as that, some grosser and cloggy parts are retained, or else much subtilized and otherwise altered.
Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 416.

All the ancient, honest juridical principles and institutions of England are so many clogs to check and retard the headlong course of violence and oppression.
Burke. To the Sheriffs of Bristol.

CLO'ISTER, v. CLO'ISTER, n. CLO'ISTERAL. CLO'ISTERED. CLO'ISTERER. CLO'ISTERESS. CLO'ISTERING, n. CLAU'STRAL. } Fr. Cloistre; It. Chiostro; Sp. Claustro; Lat. Claustrum; quo aliquid clauditur. Bale, writes Claustral. Applied to—

A place in which those, who devoted themselves to a life of religious observances, enclosed or shut themselves up. Also (as Cotgrave expresses it) to a round walk or enclosure covered over head, and environed with pillars.

A closter thei bigan, the bishop tho that wrought,
Hired ilk a man, & all paied & bought.—R. Brunne, p. 80.

And I shal kevery goure church, and goure cloistre makan.

Bale. English Votaries, pt. i.

That all the sweetness of the world in one,
The youth and virtue that would taine wild tygers,
And wilder people, that have known no manners,
Should live thus cloistered up.
Beaum. & Fletch. A King and no King, Act iv.

Though I am a cloystered man in the condition of my present life, besides my confinement by infirmity, yet having spent so much of mine age among noise abroad, and seven years thereof in the court at home, there doth still hang upon me, I know not how, a certain concupiscence of novelties.—Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 363.

Far from revenge; soon won; soon made content;
As fitter for a cloister than a crown:
Whose holy mind so much addicted is
On th' world to come, that he neglecteth this.
Daniel. The Civil Wars, b. v.

Yet is it in that kind, as best accords

Shakespeare. Rich. III. Act iii. sc. 3.

[We] will hand in hand all headlong cast vs downe,
And on the ragged stones beat forth his braines,
And make a mutuall closure of our house.
Id. Titus Andronicus, Act v. sc. 3.

The issue of the whole action, in the young man's not closing with Christ's proposals about eternal life, and his sorrowful departure thereupon, lays before us a full account of that misery, which attends a final dereliction of Christ.
South, vol. vi. Ser. 8.

We have it, it seems, in our power, by the exercise of one particular virtue, to secure a pardon to ourselves for neglecting all the rest, and can blot out the remembrance of an ill-spent life, by a few acts of charity at the close of it.
Atterbury, vol. i. Ser. 2.

But when any point of doctrine is handled in a close and argumentative manner, it appears flat and unsavory to them; has nothing in it of the life and power of godliness, and is all mere human reasoning.—Id. vol. iv. Ser. 5.

King Philip lost the best part of his cavalry in that action: upon which he retired towards Saragossa, but was closely followed by king Charles.
Burnet. Own Time. Anne, an. 1710.

The works of David Teniers, Jun. are worthy the closest attention of a painter, who desires to excel in the mechanical knowledge of his art.
Sir J. Reynolds. Journey to Flanders and Holland.

This immense field was composed of different kinds of ice, such as high hills, loose or broken pieces packed close together, and what, I think, Greenlandmen call field ice.
Cook. Voyage, vol. iii. b. i. c. 3.

In the general emulation of wit and genius, which the festivity of the Restoration produced, the poets shook off their constraint, and considered translation as no longer continued to servile closeness.—Idler, No. 69.

That she him might not perceiue.—Gower. Con. A. b. i.

In the east church, the priest standeth, as it were, in a trevice, or closet, hang'd round about with curtains, or veils, apart from the people.
Burnet. Rec. pt. ii. b. iii. Answer of Dr. Cole, &c.

The louing mother, that nine moneths did beare,
In the deare closet of her painefull side,
Her tender babe, it seeing safe appeare,
Doth not so much reioyce, as she reioyced there.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. iii. c. 2. s. 11.

——— And now we learn
They're all retir'd to Flanders, to the dam
That nurs'd this eager whelp, Margaret of Burgundy.
But we will hunt him there too, we will hunt him,
Hunt him to death, even in the beldam's closet.
Ford. Perkin Warbeck, Act I. sc. 1.

So where the neatest badger most abides,
Deep in the earth she frames her pretty cell,
And into halls and closulets divides.
P. Fletcher. The Purple Island, c. 6.

About this time, I happened to be with my Lord Treasurer one evening in his closet, when a packet came to him from Mr Montague, ambassador at Paris, giving him an account of a large conference Monsieur de Louvois had lately had with him, by the king his master's order.

Chaucer. The Knightes Tale, v. 2747.

The ground also would now be broken up for a fallow against the next yeare, according to the mind and councell of Virgil especially, to the end that the sunne might thoroughly parch and concoct the clots, and thereby make it more mellow.—Holland. Plinie, b. xviii. c. 26.

——— But when lust,
By unchaste looks, loose gestures, and foul talk,
But most by lewd and lavish act of sin,
Lets in defilement to the inward parts,
The soul grows clotted by contagion.
Milton. Comus, l. 467.

The ploughman must beware that the clots ride not one upon another's back:—badly is that land ploughed, which after the corn is sowed, needs the great harrowes and clotting.—Holland. Plinie, b. xviii. c. 19.

Ther. I will see you hang'd like clot-poles ere Spenser. Shepherd's Calendar, September.

That they sent thither also great quantities of bull and cow hides, and brought from thence in exchange Europe commodities; as hats, linnen and woollen, wherewith they clothed themselves.—Dampier. Voyage, an. 1684.

One thing the mention of the girls brings into my mind, which must not be forgot; that is, that your son's cloths be never made strait, especially about the breast.
Locke. Of Education, s. 11.

Thus are men apt to play with their healths and their lives, as they do with their cloaths; which may be better excused, since both are so transitory, so subject to be spoiled with common use, to be torn by accidents, and at the best to be soon worn out.—Sir W. Temple. Of Health & Long Life.

The plague was so sunk in London, that the inhabitants began to return to it, and brought with them a great deal of manufacture, which was lying on the hands of the clothiers and others, now in the second year of the war, in which trade and all other consumptions were very low.
Burnet. Own Time, an. 1666.

Those that are citizens of the new Jerusalem, must have the cloathing and the garb of such citizens, even the long white robes of a pure, unspotted righteousness.
South, vol. vi. Ser. 12.

——— A dark hill, steep and high,
Holds and charms the wandering eye!
Deep are his feet in Towy's flood,
His sides are cloth'd with waving wood,
And ancient towers crown his brow.—Dyer. Grongar Hill.

He would not, however, part with it till he had the cloth in his possession, and as there could be no transfer of property, if with equal caution I had insisted upon the same condition, I ordered the cloth to be handed down to them, upon which, with amazing coolness, instead of sending up the skin, he began to pack up both that and the baize.
Cook. Voyage, vol. i. b. ii. c. 1.

With him, the cloathing is neither woollen, nor linnen, nor silk, satin, or velvet: it is drapery: it is nothing more.
Sir J. Reynolds, Disc. 4.

Right now the highe windes blowe:
And anon after thei ben lowe.
Now cloudie, and now clere it is.—Gower. Con. A. Prol.

Likewise hee may bee called cloudie, for as the cloudes keep the sonne shining from vs, so doth his ignorauncе keepe him blindfolde from the true vnderstanding of thinges.
Wilson. The Arte of Rhetorike, p. 173.

Vntil the full age were come, that God would shew him openly vnto the whole worlde, and deliuer them from their shadowes and cloudelight, and the heathen out of their dead slepe, of starck blinde ignorancy.—Tyndall. Workes, p. 13.

And his next son for wealth and wisdom fam'd,
The clouded ark of God till then in tents
Wand'ring, shall in a glorious temple enshrine.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. xii.

Was I deceiv'd, or did a sable cloud
Turn forth her silver lining on the night?
I did not err, there does a sable cloud
Turn forth her silver lining on the night,
And casts a gleam over this tufted grove.—Id. Comus.

Then with uplifted hands, and eyes devout,
Grateful to heav'n, over his head beholds
A dewy cloud, and in the cloud a bow
Conspicuous with three listed colours gay,
Betok'ning peace from God, and cov'nant new.
Id. Paradise Lost, b. xi.

The dragon likewise if he finde his eyes to be dim, clenseth, scoureth, and dispatcheth the cloudinesse thereof with fenel.—Holland. Plutarch, p. 793.

——— But as an eagle
His cloudless thunder bolted on their heads.
Milton. Samson Agonistes.

And pleasant spring appeareth.
The grasse now ginnes to be refresht:
The swallow peeps out of her nest,
And cloudie welkin cleareth.
Spenser. Shepherd's Calendar. March.

Now night her course began, and over heav'n
Inducing darkness, grateful truce impos'd,
And silence on the odious din of warr:
Under her cloudie covert both retir'd
Victor and vanquisht.—Milton. Paradise Lost, b. vi.

The clouds and rain we shall find to be no less useful meteors than the last mentioned; as is manifest in the refreshing pleasant shades, which the clouds afford, and the fertile dews and showers, which they pour down on the trees and plants, which would languish and die with perpetual drought, but are hereby made verdant and flourishing, gay and ornamental; so that (as the Psalmist saith, Ps lxv. 12, 13) the little hills rejoice on every side, and the valleys shout for joy, they also sing.

Derham. Physico-Theology, b. i. c. 8.

I bid him produce his cane in court, which he had left at the door, he did so, and I finding it to be very curiously clouded, with a transparent amber head, and a blue ribband to hang upon his wrist, I immediately ordered my clerk, Lillie, to lay it up, and deliver out to him a plain joint, headed with walnut.—Tatler, No. 103.

Let us remember, that in this state of imperfection, there is scarce any truth so bright and clear, but that an industrious stirrer up of doubts may do somewhat towards clouding and darkening it.—Atterbury, vol. iii. ser. 8.

The day before he [King William] set out, he called me into his closet: he seemed to have a great weight upon his spirits, from the state of his affairs, which was then very cloudy.—Burnet. Own Time, an. 1690.

But all this while we seem to be to seek, what the chief and highest good superiour to knowledge is, in which the essence of the Deity principally consists, and it cannot be denied, but that Plato sometimes talks too metaphysically and cloudily about it.—Cudworth. Intellectual Syst. p. 205.

The fool to native ignorance confin'd,
No beauty beaming on his clouded mind:
Untaught to relish, yet too proud to learn,
He scorns the grace his dulness can't discern.

Mason. The Art of Painting, v. 58.

The weather had for some time been very thick, with much rain, but this day was so favourable that not a cloud intervened during the whole transit.

Cook. Voyage, vol. i. b. ii. c. 3.

'Tis this [religion] that wards the blow, or stills the smart,
Disarms affliction, or repels its dart;
Within the breast bids purest rapture rise,
Bids smiling conscience spread her cloudless skies.

Cotton. To the Rev. J. Hervey, on his Meditations.

CLOVE, n. Cloves of garlick; from Cleofian, to cleave, (Lye.) See the quotations from Holland, Plinie, (infra,) and in v. Cloven.

The garlicke head is covered and clad all over with certain very fine and thin pellicles or membranes which may be parted and divided one from another; under which you will see it compact and joined (as it were) together of many cloves in manner of kernils, and those also enclosed each one apart within their several skins.—Holland. Plinie, b. xix. c. 6.

CLOVE. Fr. Clou de Girofle; It. Chiodo di Girofano; Sp. Clavo de Especias. So called from its manifest resemblance to a nail, (Clavus, q.d. Clavus, Caryophylli.) In Dut. it is called Naeghel, in Ger. Nagel. See the quotation from Pliny.

Over and besides, there is another fruit that commeth out of India, like unto pepper cornes, and it is called cloves, [Garyophyllon] but somewhat bigger and more brittle.

Holland. Plinie, b. xii. c. 7.

They have plenty of clove-bark, of which I saw a ship-load; and for cloves, Raja Laut, whom I shall have occasion to mention, told me, that if the English would settle there, they could order matters so in a little time, as to send a ship load of cloves from thence every year.

Dampier. Voyage, an. 1686.

Cloves, although they are said originally to have been the produce of Machian, or Bachian, a small island far to the eastward, and only fifteen miles to the northward of the line, and to have been from thence disseminated by the Dutch, at their first coming into these parts, over all the eastern islands, are now confined to Amboina, and the small isles that lie in its neighbourhood.—Cook. Voy. vol. ii. b. iii. c. 11.

CLOVEN. Cloven, is the past tense and past part. of Cleave, (qv.) It is used prefixed to foot, hoof, &c.

Ne how the fire was couched first with stre
And then with drie stickes cloven a thre.

Chaucer. The Knightes Tale, v. 2936.

For after the Romanes by fine force had broken and cloven the maine battalion of the enemie in the very middest, they turned about againe, and presented themselves behind.

Holland. Livius, p. 962.

Thro' the deep groves I hear the chaunting birds,
And thro' the clover'd vale the various lowing herds.

Warton, Ode 8. Morning.

CLOUGH, n. The past part. of A. S. Cleofian, findere, to cleave, clouve, clough, cleaved or divided.

A clough or clough, is a kinde of breach or valley downe a slope from the side of a hill, where commonly shragges, and trees doe grow. It is the termination of Colclough or rather Colkclough, and some other sirnames.

Verstegan. Restitution of decayed Intelligence, c. 9.

CLOUT, v. } Clout (the noun) is the past
CLOUT, s. } part. of Cleofian, findere, to CLO'UTED, adj. } cleave. Clouved, clouv'd,
CLO'UTERLY. } clout;—cleaved, or divided into small pieces. (See Tooke, ii. 178.) "Clouted cream," he adds, "is so called for the same reason." See also CLOD and CLOT.

To clout, is to put on or cover with, clouts, pieces or patches; to patch, to botch. Also—

To clout, or to give a clout,—to strike, to give a blow. The meaning perhaps is,—to strike or hit, as with a clod or clot, with any thing bumpish; or, according to the proverb cited in Beaum. & Fletch. to beat to clouts. We still have the expression,—to beat to pieces.

Clouted, in Bible, 1551, is in our common version, wounded.

Clouterly, perhaps, is like any thing clouted, patched or botched; i. e. clumsy: or otherwise, it may be clowterly; i. e. clownishly. See CLOWN.

Bothe to karde and to kembe. to clouten and to wasche.

Piers Ploughman, p. 151.

But se thi self in thi sight, whou somme of hem walketh

As he the surface thus, so likewise will he show,
The clownish blazons, to each country long ago,
Which those unletter'd times, with blind devotion lent,
Before the learned maids our fountains did frequent,
To show the muse can shift her habit, and she now
Of Paladins that sung, can whistle to the plough:
And let the curious tax his clownery, with their skill
He recks not, but goes on, and say they what they will

Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 23.

Men are like wine, not good before the lees of clownishness be setled.—Feltham, pt. ii. Res. 69.

Oct. How now, slave!
Goth. I was fainting
A clown-like qualm seized on me; but I am
Recovered.—Massinger. Bashful Lover, Act iii. sc. 1.

His soul bely'd the features of his face;
Beauty was there, but beauty in disgrace.
A clownish mein, a voice with rustic sound,
And stupid eyes that ever lov'd the ground.

Dryden. Cymon & Iphigenia.

There is indeed sometimes a grossness and clownishness in Theocritus, which Virgil, who borrowed his greatest beauties from him, hath avoided.—Guardian, No. 28.

The clown, the child of nature, without guile,
Blest with an infant's ignorance of all
But his own simple pleasures; now and then
A wrestling match, a foot-race, or a fair;
Is balloted, and trembles at the news.—Cowp. Task, b. iv.

CLOY, v. } See ACCLOY. Fr. Encloyer,
CLO'YING, s. } to cloy, choak or clog up, (Cot-CLO'YLESS. } grave.) Skinner thinks from CLO'YMENT. } the Lat. Claudere, to close.

"Cloys his beak," (Shakespeare, Cymbeline); Tyrwhitt, Farmer, and Steevens, agree, means "Claws his beak."

To cloy, (in Speed,) is evidently to choak or clog up;—to cloy, as applied to the appetite, is to choak or clog up the active powers of the palate: to pall, to satiate, to glut or surfeit them. All the other usages seem deduced, consequentially, from to clog,—to glut or surfeit; as to cloy with tears,—to glut with, to steep in tears; to cloy with woes,—to glut or surfeit with woes.

Then bathe I bed with brine,
and cloy my couch with teares,
And mid my slepe thy gristly ghost
in straungle sort appeares
Turberville. To his Love long Absent.

A bearing wyfe with brats will cloy thee sore.
Id. To a Young Gentleman taking a Wyfe.

Where many dayes in mirth,
And lolytie they spent,
Both satisfied with deep delight,
And cloyde with al content.
Gascoigne. The Fable of Philomela.

Agayne as soone as they haue been well fedde, and after that helpe hath been done to the euils of a greate mayny, than, lest on the one side fammyaritye maye engendre contempte, or on the othersyde to muche presence may be a cloying to them, let him sequestre himself into his solitary cosette, to the ende that, &c.—Udal. Luke, c. 5.

The duke's purpose was to have cloyed the harbour by sinking ships laden with stones, and such like choaking materials.—Speed. Hen. VI. b. ix. c. 10. s. 30.

There now he liueth in eternall blisse,
Joying his Goddesse, and of her enjoyed:
Ne feareth he henceforth that foe of his,
Which with his cruell tuske him deadly clyd.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. iii. c. 6.

We, set in th' autumn, in the withering
And sullen season of a cold defect,
Must taste those sowre distastes the times do bring
Upon the fulness of a cloy'd neglect.
Daniel. Musophilus.

There was a nobleman said of a great counsellor, "That he would have made the worst farrier in the world: for he never shod horse but he cloyed him: for he never commended any man to the king for service, or upon occasion of suit, or otherwise, but that he would come in, in the end, with a but, and drive in a nail to his disadvantage."
Bacon. Apophthegms.

Is Christian piety so homely, and so unpleasant, and Christian men so cloy'd with her, as that none will study and teach her, but for lucre and preferment?
Milton. Animadv. upon the Remonst. Defence.

For cloy'd with woes and trouble store
Burchard my soul doth lie,
My life at death's uncheerfull door
Unto the grave draws nigh. Id. Psalm 88

Heav'n knows, with thee alone I sadly part:

P. Fletcher. Elizo to Sir Anthony Irby.

Alas, their loue may be called appetite,
No motion of the liuer, but the palat,
That suffer surfet, cloyment, and reuolt;
But mine is all as hungry as the sea
And can digest as much.
Shakespeare. Twelfth Night, Act ii. sc. 4.

That sleepe and feeding may prorogue his honour,
Euen till a Lethied dulnesse.
Id. Antony & Cleopatra, Act ii. sc. 1.

This and some other innovations, in the measure of his (Milton) verse has varied his numbers in such a manner, as makes them incapable of satisfying the ear and cloying the reader, which the same uniform measure would certainly have done, and which the perpetual returns of rhime never fail to do in long narrative poeme.—Spectator, No. 285.

Yes, ye sweet fields, besides your osier'd stream,
Full many an Attic hour my youth enjoy'd;
Full many a friendship form'd life's happiest dream,
And treasur'd many a bliss, which never cloy'd.
Whitehead. To the Rev. Dr. Lowth.

CLUB, v. }
CLUB, n. }
CLU'BBED, adj. }
CLU'BBISH. }

Ger. Kolb; Sw. Klubba, which Wachter thinks is from the Ger. Kloppen, ferire, pulsare; A. S. Clappan. Ihre from Klumpe, massa. It is applied to—

A piece of wood or other substance, of sufficient dimensions for the hand to grasp at one end, and thickening at the other.

But they [her legges] were sturdy and stubbied
Mighty pestels and clubbed.—Skelton. Eleanor Rumming.

Wherin I mean to tell what race they ronne,
Who followe drummes before they know the dubbe,
And bragge of Mars before they feele his clubbe.
Gascoigne. The Fruits of Warre.

Then all the yoūg mē resisted the alderman, & toke him from maistr Mondy, and cryed prentyses and clubbes. Then out at euery doore came clubbes and weapos and the aldermen fled, and was in great daungier.—Hall. Hen. VIII. an. 9.

The first battell that ever was fought, was between the Africanes and Aegyptians; and the same performed by bastons, clubs, and coulstaves.
Holland. Pliny, b. vii. c. 56.

Next, Hercules his like ensample shewed,
Who all the west with equal conquest wonne,
And monstrous tyrants with his club subdewed:
The club of Justice dread, with kingly power endewed.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. v. c. 1.

The highest trees be soonest blowen downe:
Ten kings do die before one clubbish clowne
Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 231.

As logic is club fisted and crabbed, so she is terrible at first sight.—Howell, b. i. s. 5. Let. 9.

Æschines writeth, that Lysicles, a grasier, being before but a mean man, and of a clubbish nature, came to be the chief man of Athens, by frequenting the company of Aspasia, after the death of Pericles.—North. Plutarch, p. 143.

In its aurelia state, it hath quite a different body with a club-head.—But when it becomes a gnat, no finny tail, no club-head, but all is made in the most accurate manner for flight and motion in the air, as before it was for the waters.
Derham. Physico-Theology, b. viii. c. 6.

This man being pointed out to me, completely equipped in the war habit, with a club in each hand, as he seemed bent on mischief, I took those from him, broke them before his eyes, and with some difficulty, forced him to retire from the the place.—Cook. Voyage, vol. iii. c. 10.

CLUB, v. }
CLUB, n. }
CLU'BBIST. }

From the A. S. Cleofan, cleafan, findere, to divide; because the expenses are divided into shares or portions, (Skinner.) And thus—

To club is to contribute a share or portion.

A club,—an assembly of persons, contributing each his share or portion.

The word is not very old, but very common in the time of the Spectator, Tatler, &c.

I would ask you one civil question. What right has any man among you, or any association of men, (to come nearer to you) who out of Parliament cannot be considered in a publick capacity, to meet, as you daily do in factious clubs, to vilifie the Government in your discourses, and to libel it in all your writings?—Dryden. Medal. Epis. to the Whigs.

We were both going towards Westminster, and finding the streets were so crowded that we could not keep together, we were resolved to club for a coach.—Tatler, No 137.

We therefore proceeded to fit up the club-room, and provide conveniences for our accommodation.—Guard. No 91.

O mighty triumph! high renown!
Two Gods have brought one mortal down;
Have club'd their forces in a storm.
Mallet. Zephyr, or the Stratagem.

But I should question whether all this civick swearing, clubbing and feasting, would dispose them more than at present they are disposed, to an obedience to the officers.
Burke. Reflections on the French Revolution.

On Thursday night you know with how much sorrow,
I bid the club farewell—"I go to morrow—"
To morrow came, and so accordingly
Unto the place of rendezvous went I.
Byrom. Robbery of the Cambridge Coach.

CLUCK, v. Fr. Clucher, clocher. To cluck, is—To click, clock, or cluck. See CLOCK.

——— Thou hast never in thy life
Shew'd thy deere mother any curtesie,
When she (poore hen) fond of no second brood
Has clock'd thee to the warres: and safelie home
Loden with honor.—Shakespeare. Coriolanus, Act v. sc. 3.

So long doth the great brood-hen cluck her chickens, as she takes them to be hers; but if once they fly from the protection and safe defence of her wings, she leaveth them as a prey to the puttock.—State Trials. Henry Garnet, an. 1606.

CLUM. A. S. Clumian, mussitare, murmurare, to mutter or murmur; it. tegere, operire, to cover, to hide, to keep close or secret. Hence Chaucer uses clum, pro silentii notâ, (Somner.)

A note of silence.

Now, Pater noster, clum, said Nicholay,
And clum quod John, and clum said Allein.
Chaucer. The Milleres Tale, v. 3639.

CLUMP, n. }
CLU'MPER, v. }

Ger. Klump; Dut. Klompe, massa. Wachter thinks from Kleben, adhærere, or Laben, coagulari. From the A. S. Ge-lim-an, to connect, to keep or hold together; (by pronunciation of gel, as gl,) we have Glum-an, past part. glum-ed, (and by change of g into c,) Clum-ed or clumb-ed, clumpt, clump. A clump is now applied to—

A number or quantity, e. g. of trees placed or planted close together.

England, Scotland, Ireland, and our good confederates the United Provinces, be all in a clump together.
Bacon. Of a War with Spain.

Vapours which now themselves consort
In several parts, and closely do conspire,
Clumper'd in balls of clouds.—More. Song of the Soul

Where round the lawn might wind the varied way,
Now lost in gloom, and now with prospect gay;
Now screen'd with clumps of green, for wintry bow'rs,
Now edg'd with sunny banks for summer flow'rs.
Scott. The Garden, Fp. 1.

On the west end of the island is a large tree, or clump of trees, that in appearance resembles a tower.
Cook. Voyage, vol. i. b. i. c. 7.

CLU'MSY, adj. }
CLU'MSILY. }
CLU'MSINESS. }

Probably of the same origin as clump, and formed immediately from it. Mr. Grose says, clumps, clumpet, i. e. clumsy, idle, lazy, unhandy. And thus clumsy is—

Unhandy, awkward, heavy, massive, unwieldy.

In the greater bodies the forge was easy, the matter being ductile and sequacious, obedient to the hand and stroke of the artificer, apt to be drawn, formed or moulded into such shapes and machines even by clumsy fingers.
Ray. On the Creation, pt. ii.

The manufacture would be tedious, and at last but clumsily performed.—Spectator, No. 232.

Therefore this morning I'll begin,
Try how your clumsiness will spin.
King. Art of Love, pt. viii.

That pow'r is music: far beyond the stretch
Of those unmeaning warblers on our stage;
Those clumsy heroes, those fat-headed gods,
Who move no passion justly, but contempt.
Armstrong. The Art of Preserving Health, b. iv.

These canoes were of unequal sizes; some thirty feet long, two broad, and three deep; they are composed of several pieces of wood clumsily sewed together with bandages.
Cook. Voyage, vol. iv. b. iii. c. 6.

CLU'STER, v. }
CLU'STER, n. }

A. S. Cluster or clyster, racemus; Dut. Kluster, which Junius thinks is from the Dut. and Ger. Kluven, adhærere; to adhere or stick together; probably to close to be or become close.

To be, or cause to be close together; to keep close together; to assemble or collect close together.

As this grewe on, the priestes of the countrey clustering together, beganne to grudge, and storme against Tyndall, raylng at him, in houses and other meeting places.
Tyndall. Workes. Life, by Fox.

The mountaines were not rayde so quick
but down they fell as fast.
And giants in a cluster thick
to Tellus fell at last.
Turberville. A Myrrour of the Fall of Pride.

Also within the flappe of the lyft syde of his jacket, we fynde a greate cluster of blonde, and the jacket folden downe thereupon, whiche thyng the sayde Hun coulde neuer folde nor do after he was hanged.—Hall. Hen. VIII. an. 6.

Whiles in the ayre their clust'ring armie flies,
That as a cloud doth seem to dim the skies,
No man nor beast may rest, or take repast,
For their sharpe wounds, and noyous iniuries.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. ii. c. 9.

——— Hyacinthin locks
Round from his parted forlock manly hung
Clustring, but not beneath his shoulders broad.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. iv.

Her deeds were like great clusters of ripe grapes,
Which lead the bunches of the fruitfull vine:
Offring to fall into each mouth that gapes,
And fill the same with store of timely wine.
Spenser. Colin Clouts come home againe.

I saw them under a green mantling vine,
That crawls along the side of yon small hill,
Plucking ripe clusters from the tender shoots.
Milton. Comus.

Of various states, the various bounds appear;
There wide Hispania, fruitful Gallia here;
Belgia's moist soil conspicuous from afar,
And Flandria, long the field of a destructive war.
Germania too, with cluster'd vines o'erspread.
Hughes. Triumph of Peace.

The most southerly of them is Nicobar itself, but all the cluster of islands, lying south of the Andeman Islands, are called by our seamen the Nicobar Islands.
Dampier. Voyage, an. 1688.

This charm to give, great Titian wisely made
The cluster'd grapes his rule of light and shade.
Mason. Dufresnoy. The Art of Painting.

CLUTCH, v. }
CLUTCH, n. }

Clutches, i. e. clutchers, (gelatchers,) the past part. of Ge-læccan, capere, arripere, to take, catch, or seize hold of. (See Tooke.) Upon this past part. the verb to clutch is formed.

To take, catch or seize, to grasp or gripe.

——— Power hym failleth
To cluteke, other to clawe.—Piers Ploukman, p. 320.

Thou shalt obey,
Come on thy way
I haue thee in my clouche,
Thou goest not hence,
For all the pense,
The mayre hath in his pouche.
Sir T. More. Works, p. ii.

Whilst they are wrestling, crossing thigh with thigh,
Their axes' pikes which soonest out should pluck,
They fall to ground, like in their casks to smother,
With their clutcht gauntlets cuffing one another.
Drayton. The Battle of Agincourt.

When he offereth injury as an enemy, when with the clutched fist, when upon the cheek, when upon the ear.
Holland. Plutarch. Demosthenes, p. 812.

But all in vaine, his woman was too wise,
Euer to come into his clouch againe.
Spenser. Faerie Qurene, b. iii. c. 10.

What was said to them of me, by some of my company that went on shore, I know not, but I was assured by a merchant there, that if they got me into their clutches (and it seems when I was ashore they had narrowly watched me) the governor himself could not release me.
Dampier. Voyage, an. 1699.

Should, when he pleases, and on whom he will
Wage war, with any or with no pretence
Of provocation giv'n, or wrong sustain'd,
And force the beggarly last doit, by means
That his own humour dictates, from the clutch
Of poverty!
Cowper. Task, b. v.

He prates and he patters
He clyters and he clatters.—Skelton. Boke of Colin Clout.

If it be drunke in honyed wine, it dissolveth and consumeth the clustered bloud.—Holland. Plinie, b. xxi. c. 25.

It killith them that take it inwardly by congealing and clustering their bloud.—Id. Ib. b. xxv. c. 13.

The favourite child, that just begins to prattle,
And throws away his silver bells and rattle,
Is very humoursome, and makes great clutter,
Till he has windows on his bread and butter
King. To Dr. Lister.

CLY'STER, n. } Fr. Clystère, clysteriser; It.
CLY'STERIZE, v. } Clistero; Gr. Κλυστηρ, from Κλυζ-ειν, to wash or cleanse by washing. See the first quotation from Holland.

The like desire, namely of clysters, we learned first of a foule in Egypt, which is called the Ibis (or the blacke storke) This bird having a crooked and a hooked bill, useth it instead of a syringe or pipe, to squirt water into that part, whereby it is most kind and holsome to void the doung and excrements of meat, and so purgeth and cleanseth her body.
Holland. Plinie, b. viii. c. 27.

If kine or oxen be sicke, stampe it and poure it down their throats, or else clysterize them with it.
Id. Ib. b. xx. c. 5.

Thou stinking clyster-pipe, where's the god of rest,
Thy pills and base apothecary drugs
Threaten'd to bring unto me.
Massinger. The Virgin Martyr, Act iv. sc. 1.

But to return to our medicinal smokes, it is known, that some find more good against the fits of the colick, by the clysters of the smoke of tobacco, than by any other physic they take.—Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 178.

CO. Lat. Con, i. e. Cum; Gr. Συν; denotes junction, adjunction, union. We have many words from the Lat. with this prefix; and many of our own formation. The etymology of the word to which co is prefixed must (in general) be looked for under that word.

COACERVA'TION. } perhaps from the Gr. Αγειρειν, adducere, cogere in unum, congregare. Sp. Coacervar; Fr. Coacervation. A heaping together, (Cotgrave.)

To bring together, to gather, to collect into one heap or mass.

For, if you could pry into my memory, you should discover there a huge magazine of your favours, you have been pleased to do me, present and absent, safely stored up and coacervated to preserve them from mouldring away in oblivion, for courtesies should be no perishable commodity.
Howell, b. i. s. 1. Let. 33.

So that the fixing of it. [gold] is not want of spirit to fly out, but the equal spreading of the tangible parts, and the close coacervation of them.—Bacon. Nat. Hist. s. 799.

Whereas our author pretends to prove, not only that there is no concrete vacuity in the space so often mentioned, but absolutely that there is none.

COACH, n. } rosse; It. Cocchio and Carozza; Sp. Cóche and Caroça; Dut. Koetse, koetsie, koetswagen, and Karosse. Dr. T. H. derives Coach, from the Fr. Carosse; It. Caroccia, and these from the Lat. Carruca. (See CAROCHE.) Minshew and Menage from the Hungaric, Kotczy; Wachter from the obsolete Ger. Kutten, tegere, (q.d.) vehiculum cameratum. Lye observes that the ancient Dut. Koetsen, is Cubare, to lie down. Coach, and Caroche, are distinguished by Stow, (see the quotation from him,) as carriages—differing either in form or size, and are, no doubt, different words.

Coach and Couch are probably the same words; the former applied to a movable or wheeled carriage, adapted for a lying or recumbent position; the latter for a stationary repository.

It is for these that Fine man meets the street
Coach'd, or on foot-cloth, thrice chang'd every day,
To teach each suit, he has the ready way
From Hyde Parke to the stage, where at the last
His deare and borrow'd bravery he must cast
B. Jonson. To a Friend.

——— When I runne,

Drayton, Eclogue 7.

My swains do draw in silken geeres,
My wheeles be shod with downe,
No hardines is in beauties' coach.
Warner. Albion's England, b. vi. c. 30.

In the yeere 1564. Guylliam Boonen, a Dutchman, became the queene's coachmanne and was the first that brought the use of coaches into England. And after a while, divers great ladies, with as great jealousie of the queene's displeasure, made them coaches, and rid in them up and downe the countries, to the great admiration of all the beholders, but then by little and little, they grew vsuall among the nobilitie, and others of sort, & within twenty yeeres became a great trade of coach-making.—Lastly, even at this time, 1605, began the ordinary use of carroaches.
Stow. King James, 1605.

Under the first are comprehended all those who are carried down in coach-fulls to Westminster-hall every morning in term-time.—Spectator, No. 21.

Here comes the coach, so very slow

Epi. Speak to him, fellow, speak to him. I'll have none of this coacted, unnatural dumbnesse in my house, in a family where I governe.
B. Jonson. The Silent Woman, Act iii. sc. 4.

It is worthy to be noted, that we finde three examples of such a kind of coactive jurisdiction, (if I may so term it) exercised either by our Saviour, when he was here on earth, or by his Apostles; and all three for the profanation of that which was sacred.—Mede. Works, b. i. Dis. 26.

Thou [affection] dost make possible things not so held,

With what's vnreal thou coactive art,
And fellow'st nothing.—Shakes. Winter's Tale, Act I. sc. 2.

And aske those that say it [a spirit] is neither as a mathematical point, nor totally present, nor extended, whether they conceive it any thing more capable thereby of that vital sympathy and coactivity, that transmits objects in their exact circumstances to the common percipient.
More. Philosophical Writings, Pref.

In all that a servant does he is scarce a voluntary agent, but when he serves himself: all his services otherwise, not flowing naturally from propensity and inclination, but being drawn and forced from him by terror and coaction.
South. Serm. vol. ii. Ser. 2.

It follows that this independent religious society hath not, in and of itself any coactive power of the civil kind its inherent jurisdiction being in its nature and use, entirely different from that of the state.

Whereas those higher hills to view fair Tone that stand,
Her coadjuting springs much more content behold.
Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 3.

Heare all men, that I Richard Earle of Cornwall sweare vpon the holy Gospels, to be faithfull and forward to reforme with you the kingdome of England, hitherto by the counsell of wicked men too much deformed. And I will be an effectuall coadiutor to expell the rebels and troublers of the realme, from out the same.—Speed. Hen. III. an. 1259.

He was ignorant that the sun would not passe the bounds and limits appointed unto him; for otherwise the Furies and cursed tongues which are the ministresses and coadjutresses of justice would find him out.—Holland. Plutarch, p. 1063.

It [crystal] is a mineral body in the difference of stones, and reduced by some into that subdivision, which comprehendeth gemms, transparent and resembling glass or ice, made of a leutous percolation of earth, drawn from the most pure and limpid juice thereof, owing unto the coldness of the earth some concurrence or coadjuvancy, but not immediate determination and efficiency.

The plebeian ædiles were chosen out of the commons; and were in some respects a sort of coadjutors to the tribunes.—Melmoth. Cicero, b. iii. Let. 32, Note.

CO-ADVE'NTURER. Co, ad, and venturus, the part. future of venire, to come.

He who, (with one or more,) tries, risks, hazards, braves, what may or is about to come or to happen.

There is a worthy captain in this town, who was a coadventurer in that expedition, who, upon the storming of St. Thomas, heard young Mr. Raiegh encouraging his men in these words: "Come on my noble hearts, this is the mine we come for, and they who think there is any other are fools."—Howell, b. ii. Let. 61.

CO-ADUNA'TION, or Coadun'tion. } Fr. Coadunation; Co, ad, and unus. A compound used, emphatically, for the simple word, Union.

Unless men could be members, and parts, and sons of a church, whereof there is no coadunation, no authority, no governour.—J. Taylor. Episcopacy Asserted, s. 3.

He that erects another œconomy, than what the master of the family hath ordained, destroys all those relations of mutual dependence which Christ hath made for the coadunation of all the parts of it, and so destroys it in the formality of a Christian congregation or family.—Id. Ib. s. 22.

Bodies seem to have an intrinsick principle of, or corruption from the coadunation of particles endued with contrary qualities.—Hale. Origin. of Mankind.

CO-Æ'VAL, or Coe'val, adj. Coe'val, n. Coe'vity. Coe'vous. } From Co, and ævum; Gr. Αιων v inserto, more Æolum. Αιων, quasi aει ov, semper existens, (Vossius.) Of the same duration in time, of the same age: co-existent.

Even Tully himselfe, the patterne of eloquence to all succeeding ages, and one of the most absolute, and eminent in his profession, that ever the world yeelded, was notwithstanding sharply censured, and taunted at by his coevals, as swelling after the Asiatique manner, too redundant and frequent in repetitions, in jests sometime too cold, and in the composure of his matter broken and effeminate.
Hakewill. Apologie, p. 29.

Our misery is not of yesterday, but as antient as the first criminal, and the ignorance we are involved in almost coeval with the humane nature.
Glanvill. The Vanity of Dogmatizing, c. 1.

They who conceived the world to have had a temporary beginning or creation, held the co-evity of all souls with it.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, p. 39.

I remember Pliny tells us of some oaks growing in his time in the Hercynian forest, which were thought coevous with the world itself.—Evelyn. Sylva, c. 29.

The history of Redemption is coeval with that of the globe itself, has run through every stage of its existence, and will outlast its utmost duration.—Hurd. Serm. Feb. 1781.

O my coevals! remnants of yourselves!
Poor human ruins, tottering o'er the grave!
Shall we, shall aged men, like aged trees,
Strike deeper their vile root, and closer cling,
Still more enamour'd of this wretched soil!
Young. Complaint, Night 4.

CO-AFFO'REST. See Afforest.

Henry Fitz Empresse [viz. the Second] did coaforest much land, which continued all his reign, though much complained of.—Howell, b. iv. Let. 16.

Massinger. City Madam, Act iii. sc. 2.

CO-A'GMENT. See Co-augment.

CO-A'GULATE, v. Coa'gulable. Coagula'tion. Coa'gulative. Coagula'tor. Coagula'tory. Coa'gulum. } It. Coagulare; Sp. Co-agular. From Co-agulatus, the past part. of Co-agulare, itself from Co-agere. See Co-act. Fr. Co-aguler, to curd or congeal into a curd, to joyn together, to make to joyn, (Cotgrave.)

The player in Hamlet uses coagulate as an adjective, (Act ii. sc. 2.) "And thus o're-sized with coagulate gore."

And indeed it stands to very good reason that the bodies of devils, being nothing but coagulated aire, should be cold, as well as coagulated water, which is snow or ice; and that it should have a more keen and piercing cold, it consisting of more subtile particles, than those of water, and therefore more fit to insinuate, and more accurately and stingingly to affect and touch the nerves.
More. Antidote against Atheism, c. 12. p. 125.

And experiments, purposely made, have shown, that, if some acids be conveyed immediately into the mass of blood, they will coagulate even that liquor, whilst it continues in the vessels of the yet living animals.
Boyle. Works, vol. v. p. 90.

He knows that the serum, that swims upon the blood out of the body, is by a gentle heat immediately coagulable into a thick white substance, not unlike a custard.
Id. Ib. vol. ii. p. 79.

But of the coagulation of distilled liquors, such as even chymists themselves are not wont to look upon as at all disposed to coagulation, I may elsewhere have a better opportunity to entertain you, and therefore I shall forbear to do it now.—Id. Ib. vol. i. p. 333.

I remember then, that I, divers years ago, prepared a salt, which either was, or at least answered well to the qualities ascribed to that which is now called Glauberus's sal mirabilis, which seemed to have in it a coagulative power, in reference to common water.—Id. Ib. vol. i. p. 423.

Sometimes a specific medicine may mortify the over acid or other immoderate particles, that infest the mass of the blood, and destroy their coagulatory or other effects.
Id. Ib. vol. v. p. 87.

The women of an advanced age, had their hair cropped short; and many were cut, in oblique lines, all over the fore part of the body; and some of the wounds, which formed rhomboidal figures, had been so lately inflicted, that the coagulated blood still remained in them.
Cook. Voyage, vol. vi. b. ii. c. 2.

COAL, n. Coal, v. Co'aly. } Of unsettled etymology. A. S. Col; Ger. and Dut. Kole; Sw. Kol. Vossius derives from the Gr. Καλεος pro κηλεος, ignis epitheton. Wachter from Κηλοειν, comburere. Ihre seems to decide for the Sw. Quilla; Westro-Goth. Kylla, accendere ignem, to kindle a fire.

To coal (Camden) is to mark with coal, generally, do any thing with coal.

As blake he lay as any cole or crow,
So was the blood yronnen in his face.
Chaucer. The Knightes Tale, v. 2694.

Instede of cote-armure on his harneis,
With nayles yelwe, and bright as any gold,
He hadde a bere's skin, cole-blake for old.—Id. Ib. v. 2144.

Their few parcels [of copse] yet preserued are principally imployed to coaling, for blowyng of tynne. This lacke they supply, either by stone cole, fetched out of Wales, or by dried turfes, some of which are also conuerted into coale to serue the tynners turne.—Carew. Survey of Cornwall, p. 21.

And he made all the vessels of the altar: the cauldons, shouels, basyns, fleshhokes and colepannes all of brass.
Bible, 1551. Exodus, c. 38.

Dan Elingham, a monke of Linton of Saint Benedict's order, comming to the White-friers in Nottingham, found there John Baptist painted in a white friars weed, whereat marualling, hee coled out these rymes vpon the wall nere to the picture.—Camden. Remains. Rythmes.

The wood cut, and set out ready for the coaling, &c.
Evelyn. Sylva, c. 30.

The eagle in Æsop, seeing a piece of flesh, now ready to be sacrificed, swept it away with her clawes, and carried it to her nest; but there was a burning coale stuck to it by chance, which unawares consumed her, young ones, nest and altogether.—Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 138.

And thou, poor earth, whom fortune doth attaint,
In nature's name to suffer such a harm,
As for to lose thy gem, and such a saint,
Upon thy face let coaly ravens swarm.
Sidney. Arcadia, b. iv.

Or rocky Avon, or of sedgy Lee,

Milton. Vac. Ex. l. 98.

Then Nestor broil'd them on the coal-turned wood,
Powr'd blacke wine on; and by him yong men stood.
Chapman. Homer. Odyssey, b. iii.

What Cato taught, Heaven sure cannot deny,
Bereav'd of all, we still have pow'r to die,
Then down her throat the burning coal conveyed,
"Go now, ye fools, and hide your swords," she said.
Smart. Martial, b. i. Ep. 26.

CO-ALE'SCE. Coale'scence. Coale'scent. Coali'te, v. Coali'tion. } From Co-aleo; and this from con, and the obsolete aleo for alo; and—ab alendo, alescere, id est crescere. (See Vossius.) Fr. Coalescer,—To close, joyn, or grow together again, (Cotgrave); to unite, to associate, to confederate.

As a whole Christ is made Mediator, and that he might be a fit one, it was requisite that he should partake of the natures of the persons between whom he was constituted Mediator, and yet both of them should coalesce into one person, but without confounding them together.
Goodwin. Works, vol. iii. pt. iii. p. 345.

This, I say, will not heal the breach that this hypothesis makes upon the Divine Wisdom; it tacitely reflecting a shameful oversight upon Omniscience, that he should not be aware of the future coalescence of these bodies into one, when he made souls for them.
Glanvill. Pre-existence of Souls, c. 2.

One heart, one way, was the motto of the prophet, when he foretels the future coalition of God's people, and one mind, one mouth, was the Apostle's to his Romans.
Bp. Hall. Christian Moderation, s. 12.

Perhaps, if the degree of fire were much increased, a more vehement agitation would surmount this cohesion, and dissipate again these clusters of coalescent corpuscles.
Boyle. Works, vol. iv. p. 308.

But however, say they, body in general, the common basis and matter of all worlds and beings, is self existent and eternal; which being naturally divided into innumerable little particles or atoms, eternally endued with an ingenit and inseparable power of motion, by their omnifarious concursions and combinations, and coalitions, produce successively (or at once, if matter be infinite) an infinite number of worlds; and amongst the rest there arose this visible complex system of heaven and earth.—Bentley, Ser. 6.

——— He answer'd not
But, with a grateful and assenting clasp,
Confirm'd me to his bosom—while our souls,
Mingling their friendships, coalesced together.
Brooke. Conrade.

Let the friends of liberty lay aside the groundless distinctions, which are employed to amuse and betray them; let them continue to coalite.—Bolingbroke. On Parties, Let. 19.

Time has by degrees in all other places and periods blended and coalited the conquered with the conquerors.
Burke. To Sir H. Langrishe.

But for the same person, in the same circumstances, to be at once the speaker, and the party addressed, this is impossible; and so therefore is the coalescence of the first and second person.—Harris. Hermes, b. i. c. 5.

No coalition, which, under the specious name of independency, carries in its bosom the unreconciled principles of the original discord of parties, ever was, or will be an healing coalition.—Burke. On a late State of the Nation.

CO-ALLY'. Co and ally; from ad, and ligare, to bind. See Ally.

To bind or unite, to join or associate together.

Such civil society can never decently or honorably act with a total disregard to that co-allied religion, which they profess to believe, and of which, under another consideration, they compose the body.
Warburton. Divine Legation. Ded. [1740] to the Jews.

CO-APPREHE'ND. Co, and apprehendere, to take hold of.

To take or seize, to catch or hold, (sc.) the meaning of any thing.

They assumed the shapes of animals common unto all eyes; and by their conjunctions and compositions were able to communicate their conceptions, unto any that co-apprehended the syntaxis of their natures.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. v. c. 20.

CO-APTA'TION. Co, and aptare, (Gr. Αρτ-ειν,) to join; to fit, or suit. See Apt, and Adapt.

Thus in a clock, the hand is moved upon the dial, the bell is struck, and the other actions belonging to the engine are performed, not because the wheels are of brass or iron, or part of one metal and part of another, or because the weights are of lead; but by virtue of the size, shape, bigness, and coaptation of the several parts.—Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 559.

As a man, that sees a screwed gun shot off, though he may not be able to describe the number, bigness, shape, and co-aptation of all the pieces of the lock, stock, and barrel, yet he may readily conceive, that the effects of the gun, how wonderful soever they may seem, may be performed by certain pieces of steel, of iron, and some parcels of wood, of gunpowder, and of lead.—Id. Ib. vol. ii. p. 47.

CO-A'RCT, v. CoA'RCTATE. CoARCTA'TION. CoA'RCTING, n. } Fr. Coarcter; It. Coartare; Lat. Coarctare. See Artus, in Vossius.

To strain, press, or thrust hard together; restrain or bring within a narrow compass, (Cotgrave.)

Notwithstandynge, rancour coarcted and longe deteyned in a narowe roume, at the last brasteth out, with intollerable vyolence, and bryngeth all to confusion.

Sir T. Elyot. The Governour, b. i. c. 2.

It seems the wind, finding this room in form of a trunk, and coarctated therein, forced the stones of the first window, like pellets, clean through it.—Fuller. Worthies. Essex.

If you straiten the artery never so much, provided the sides of it do not quite meet, and stop all passage of the blood, the vessel will notwithstanding continue still to beat below or beyond the coarctation.—Ray. The Creation, pt. ii.

Also in the first year of his reign [Hen. IV.] an act was made, That no person of what degree soeuer, should after that day alledge for his excuse any constraint or coarcting of his prince for doing of any unlawful act.

Baker. Hen. IV. an. 1412.

COARSE, adj. Co'ARSELY. Co'ARSENESS. } Anciently written course or cours. Course stitch may be running stitch: from the Lat. Cursus; Fr. Course. Junius suggests—cursarily; cursim, obiter; ut proprie denotet panum festinanter et minore cum curâ elaboratum; cloth wrought hastily, in running stitch, and with little care. It is used as equivalent to—

Rough, rude, gross.

Yea though the threeds be course, and such as others lothe
Yet must I wrap always therein, my bones and body both.

Massinger. The Picture, Act iv. sc 2.

Prophaning of Scripture, and making too cheap of it, was never so ordinary; that holy volume was never so violently and coarsly handled, even ravished and defloured by unhallowed lips—Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 606.

For habit, it was anciently sackcloth and ashes: by the coarseness of the sackcloth they ranked themselves, as it were, amongst the meanest and lowest condition of men; by ashes, and sometimes earth, upon their heads, they made themselves lower than the lowest of the creatures of God.

Mede. Works, b. i. Disc. 41.

Slave to those tyrant lords, whose yokes we bore,
And serv'd so base a bondage to before;
Yet 'twas our curse, that blessings flow'd too fast,
Or we had appetites too coarse to taste.

Otway. Windsor Castle.

And it seems to me the more probable opinion, that he [Ennius] rather imitated the fine railleries of the Greeks, which he saw in the pieces of Andronicus, than the coarseness of his own countrymen in their clownish extemporary way of jeering.—Dryden. Origin and Progress of Satire.

Jevons. The Modern fine Lady.

The bottoms of all boats therefore which are sent into this country should be painted like that of the pinnace, and the ships should be supplied with good stock, in order to give them a new coating when it should be found necessary.

Cook. Voyage, vol. i. c. 12.

CO-AUGME'NT. } Also written Coagment.
Coaugmenta'tion. } Fr. Coagumenté.

To enlarge, to increase, to make greater, to grow or become greater.

——— Come then, take armes, and let our kinde assay,
Joyne both our forces; though but two, yet being both combinde,
The work of many single handa, we may performe; we finde
That virtue coaugmented thrives, in men of little minde.
Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. xiii.

Had the worlde been coagmented from that supposed fortuitous jumble; this hypothesis had been tolerable.
Glanvill. The Vanity of Dogmatising, c. 18.

Unto this in great part true the reason of Kircherus may be added, that this variation proceedeth not only from terrestrious eminences, and magnetical veins of earth, laterally respecting the needle, but the different coagmentation of the earth disposed unto the poles, lying under the sea and waters.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. ii. c. 2.

All systems and compages of it, all συγκρίματα and ἀθροίσματα, all concretions and coagmentations, of matter divided by motion, together with the quantities resulting from them, are corruptible and destroyable.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, p 75.

COAX, v. } Corcio, cogcio, cotio; Spelman
Coax, n. } says, were a kind of beggars, who
Co'axer. } by their cries, tears and similar impostures, extorted alms. It appears from some old statutes made against vagabonds, &c. "that shipmen pretending losses of their shippes, &c." were no uncommon class of beggars, practising (see Lye in Junius) the arts ascribed by Spelman to the Cogciones. These Cogciones were no doubt the Cogmen, who navigated a kind of small ship called Cogs (cogones), common upon the coast of Yorkshire. "Cogge, if I conjecture rightly," Lye subjoins, "has been changed by the moderns into cokes." See Coc.

To coax, then, is to practise the arts of the Cogciones, or Cogs-men;—to persuade by fictitious appeals to humanity or kindness; by ascribing—to those to whom they address themselves—extreme humanity or kindness; by false pretences of need: to persuade by arts of flattery.

"A Cokes," Mr. Gifford says, "is taken by all our old writers for a simpleton, a noddy, an easy gull." (See Gifford's Ben Jonson, iv. 428, and vi. 401.) A Cokes, is one who has been coaxed, or who is easily coaxed or gulled, or deluded. Coaxer, though common in familiar speech, is not so in writing.

Princes may give a good poet such convenient countenaunce and also benefite, as are due to an excellent artificer, though they neither kiss nor coke them.
Puttenham. Art of Poetrie, p. 15.

——— Now, if you
Will be a true, right, delicate sweet mistresse,
Why, we will make a coke of this wise master.
We will, my mistresse, an absolute fine cokes,
And mock to ayre, all the deepe differences
Of such a solemne, and effectuall asse.
B. Jonson. The Devill is an Asse, Act ii. sc. 2.

Old K. Go you're a brainless coax; a toy, a fop.
Beaum. & Fletch. Wit at several Weapons, Act iii. sc. 1.

See. You are a scurvy fellow, and I am made a coke, an ass; and this same filthy crone's a flirt.
Ford. The Fancies Chaste & Noble, Act iii. sc. 3.

But if by magic this oppose
The valley of your verse and prose;
I'll be your 'squire, and firm ally,
Write, crimp, and coax him up to buy.
Fenton. Letter to the Knight of the Sable Shield.

COB, n. } "Cob, (Belg. Kop,) is head.
Co'bwer, n. } Our old writers used the word
Co'bwer, adj. } as a distinctive mark of bulk;
Co'bwebbed. } thus cob-loaf was the largest loaf of the batch, cob-apple, cob-nut, &c. were respectively the largest apples and nuts of the crop. But cob was more commonly applied to fishes, and of these chiefly to the red and white Herring, whence it became a cant term for the whole fish," (Gifford, B. Jonson, vol. i. p. 28.) Cob-swan is simply a swan of the largest size, (Id. iv. 236.) It is applied by Udal and Fox to those, who were distinguished for the largeness of their possessions—of their wealth.

From the Dut. Kop-webbe, we have Eng. Cob-web. Kop, in Dutch, being the name given to the spider; perhaps, says Skinner, from the A. S. Coppe, apex, fastigium, culmen, because they build and weave in culminibus ædium. More probably from their shape resembling the head—

Any thing round; a round stone.

In A. S. the spider is called Atter-coppa, (q. d.) poison-head. "Cob-coals, large pit-coals; cob-stones, large stones," (Grose.)

Cobby, or coppy, Brocket says, is "stout, hearty, lively;" it is also headv or headstrong.

A cob,—a horse who has his cobs.

The poore cottager contenteth himselfe with cob for his wals, and thatch for his covering.
Carew. Survey of Cornwall, fol. 53.

The floodgate will hold water best if his sides be walled vp with cob.—Id. Ib. fol. 104.

And truely nothyng dooeth better make a teacher of the Ghospell hearty, quicke, and freashe to the office of preachyng, as dooeth often goyng from al company of men into places solitary, not to yellenes, not to gamyng, or to other sensuall pleasures, (of whych sorte the reposyng of the rich cobbes of this world is whan they sequestre themselfes from the resorte of men for the most part are)—Udal. Luke, c. 5.

For that he [Thomas Holmes] was heard to saie these words after the great abiuration, when he had abiured yt y^e greatest cobs were yet behinde.—Fox. Martyrs, an. 1521.

The emperour of Rome is like to a spyder, that is in the myddes of hir webbe. For if the saied copwebbe be touched with the poinct of a nedell, the spider feleth it.
Golden Boke, c. 17.

Upon whom doubtles the common good order & manner would take punishment, saving that the lawes, as the wise saide, be like the coppe-webes, that take all the little beasts, & let the great alone.—Frees. Christian Woman, b. iii. c. 6.

Cob. The first red herring that was broil'd in Adam and Eve's kitchen, doe I fetch my pedigree from, by the Harrot's (i. e. herald's) book. His cob was my great—great—mighty—great grandfather.
B. Jonson. Every Man in his Humour, Act i. sc. 3.

For such lawes, said he [Anacharsis] do rightly resemble the spiders cobwebs: because they take hold of the little flies and gnats which fall into them, but the rich and mighty will break and run through them at their will.
North. Plutarch, p. 68.

The cobweb'd cottage, with its ragged wall
Of mouldering mud, is royalty to me!
The spider's most attenuated thread
Is cord, is cable, to man's tender tie
On earthly bliss. Young. The Complaint, Night i.

For this same decency is made
Only for bunglers in the trade,
And, like the cobweb laws, is still
Broke through by great ones when they will.
Churchill. The Ghost, b. ii.

COBBLE, v. } Skinner thinks from the Co'bbling, n. } the Dan. Kobler, calceos resarcio. It is usually applied to—

Coarse and clumsy work; to coarse mending.

His Latin tounge doth hobbyl
He doth but clout and cobbel.
Skelton. Why come ye not to Court?

Then learne to clout, thine old cast cobled shoes,
And rather bide at home with barly bread
Than learne to spoyle, as thou hast seen some do.
Gascoigne. The Steele Glas.

As good is the prayer of a cobler, as of a cardinall.
Tyndall. Workes, p. 145.

And thus my very good L. may se how cobler-like I haue clouted a new patch to an old sole, beginning this complainte of Philomene, in Aprill, 1562, continuing it a littel furder in Aprill 1575, and now thus finished this thirde day of Aprill 1576.—Gascoigne. Com. of Philomene, Postscript.

A cobler and a curat once disputed
Afore a judge, about the queene's iniunctions,
And sith that still the curat was confuted,
One said 'twas fit that they two changed functions,
Nay said the judge, that motion much I lothe,
But if you will, weell make them coblers both.
Harrington, Epigram 66.

Some wits have wonder'd what analogy
There is 'twixt cobbling and astrology;
How Partridge made his optics rise,
From a shoe sole to reach the skies.
Swift. On the supposed Death of Partridge.

Had preaching been made, and reckoned a matter of solid and true learning, of theological knowledge, and long and severe study (as the nature of it required it to be) assuredly, no preaching cobler amongst them all, would ever have ventured so far beyond his last, as to undertake it.
South, vol. iv. Ser. 1.

Cobblers will go beyond their last,
And so I'm told will authors too,
—But that's a point I leave to you;
Cobbling extends a thousand ways,
Some cobble shoes, some cobble plays,
Some—but this jingle's vastly clever,
It makes a body write for ever.
Lloyd. The Cobbler of Tenterton.

CO'BBLE. A round stone, from Cob, (ut supra.) Mr. Grose says, "Cobble, a pebble; to cobble with stones, to throw stones at any thing. Northumb. Also, round coals. Derb." Also, a kind of boat.

Spiral; in the form of a screw.

For some [hornes] are wreathed, some not: that famous one which is preserved at St. Dennis near Paris, hath wreathy spires, and chocleary turnings about it, which agreeth with the description of the unicorn's horn in Ælian.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iii. c. 23.

I might farther view the exquisite structure of the parts ministering to all these delicate offices of nature, particularly the artificial conformation of the intestines might deserve a special enquiry, their tunicks, glands, fibres traversing one another, and peristaltick motion in all creatures; and their cochleous passage to retard the motion of the chyle, and to make amends for the shortness of the intestines, in such who have but one gut.

The males of various kinds of birds; especially to the male of the domestic fowl: in its met. application—to any person or thing having any distinguishing quality of that bird; any designed or accidental resemblance to him; viz. his daringness or quarrelsomeness; his self-sufficiency and rashness; his bold and erect attitude; his position or action of offence or defence; of challenge or defiance, of exultation or triumph. Thus the cock of the club, in the Spectator, by preeminence; cock being commonly used, as Skinner remarks, pro Victore. The cock of the conduit, because, says Skinner, it used to be constructed in formâ Cristæ Galli. So also the weather-cock; the cock of a hat, the cock of a gun. And further—cock-ade. Talis is rendered by Holland, "with cocnal bones;" but why they are so called is not ascertained. See Skinner, Nares, &c.

Cock-shut time is supposed by Whalley and Mr. Gifford to be twilight; from the method practised to catch woodcocks at the time of twilight, in a net called a cock-shut. Minshew, (in ed. 1617,) has twi-light or cock-shut time; but omits it ed. 1627. Other commentators differ. See their notes on the quotation from Richard III.

And the Lord turnyde agen and bihelde Petre, and Petre hadde mynde on the word of Iesus as he hadde seide, for bifore that the cok crowe thries thou shalt denye me.
Wiclif. Luke, c. 22.

And so befell that as he cast his eye
Among the wortes on a boterflie,
He was ware of this fox that lay ful low.
Nothing ne list him thanne for to crow,
But cried anon cok, cok, and up he sterte
As man that was affraied in his herte.
Chaucer. The Nonnes Prestes Tale, v. 15,279.

And so befel, that as he cast his eye,
Among the Colworts on a butterfly,
He saw false reynard where he lay full low;
I need not swear he had no list to crow;
But cry'd cock, cock, and gave a sudden start
As sore dismaid and frighted at his heart.
Dryden. The Cock and the Fox.

Whan that the first cock hath crowe, anon

It is a duty of Christian prudence to pursue his great end with apt means and instruments in proportion to that end. No wise man will sail to Ormus in a cock-boat, or use a child for an interpreter.—Bp. Taylor, pt. ii. Ser. 20.

The boat's crew which Mr. Anson proposed to take with him, were clothed in an uniform dress, resembling that of the watermen on the Thames, they were in number eighteen and the cockswain.—Anson. Voy. round the World, b. iii. c. 9.

At this they stopped and looked round them, but in a few minutes renewed the pursuit, brandishing their lances in a threatening manner: the cockswain then fired a second musquet over their heads, but of this they took no notice; and one of them lifting up his spear to dart it at the boat, another piece was fired which shot him dead.
Cook. Voyage, vol. i. b. ii. c. 1.

Beaum. & Fletch. Martial Maid, Act iii. sc. 4.

CO'CKER, v. }
Co'CKERING, n. } The Dut. have, as Junius has noticed, Kokerillen, celebrare hilaria; they have also Kokelen, nutrire, ceu fovere culina, formed from their verb, Koken, coquere. To cocker may, then, have been primarily applied to the indulgence of the appetite. And thus, generally, to cocker, is—

To pamper, to indulge, cherish, make much of; and, as in Gray, to encourage, to inspirit.

They wold not have patience to lodge themself, taking it for shame so much to cocker themself.
Nicolt. Thucydides, fol. 65.

Furthermore, after the birth of every boy, the father was no more master of him, to cocker and bring him up after his will.—North. Plutarch, p. 41.

His own son was a little too sawcy with his mother, and with him also, bearing himself over-boldly of her good will, by means of her cockering of him.—Id. Themistocles, p. 107.

Care must be taken that this evil be no more cockered, nor the humour of it fed.—State Trials. Case of Duels, an. 1615.

More blessed in thy brest than land,
To keepe but nature even and upright,
To quench not cocker appetite.—Corbet. Country Life.

But what discipline is this, Paræus, to nourish violent affections in youth, by cockering and wanton indulgences, and to chastise them in mature age, with a boyish rod of correction!—Milton. Doctrine, &c. of Divorce.

And blame me not for disrespect,
If I the flatterer's style reject;
With that, by menial tongues supply'd,
You're daily cocker'd up in pride.—Gay, Fab. 9. pt. ii.

When I arrived in London I found Professor Turner had been dead above a fortnight; and being cockered and spirited up by some friends (though it was rather the latest) I got my name suggested to Lord Bute.

The emblem of a little boy attempting to lade all the water out of the sea with a cockle-shell doth fit T. This was another hair's breadth escape, for it was near high water, and there run a short cockling sea, which must very soon have bulged the ship if she had struck.
Cook. Voyage, vol. i. b. iii. c. 7.

An old fisherman mending his nets (while I enquired about the danger in passing these sands,) told me in his dialect, a moving story: how a brother of the trade, a cockler, as he styled him, driving a little cart with two daughters (women grown) in it, and his wife on horseback following, set out one day to pass the seven-mile sands.
Gray. Letter to Dr. Warton.

CO'CKNEY, n. }
Co'CKNEY, adj. } A great deal to little purpose has been written about this word. Hall uses it as a verb. See the quotation from him and from Fuller. Dr. T. H. sagaciously as he is wont, Skinner observes, derives Unhardy is unsely, thus men say.

Chaucer. The Reves Tale, v. 4206.

I speake not this in dispraise of the faukons, but of them whiche kepeth them lyke cokneyes.
Sir T. Elyot. The Governour, b. i. c. 13.

And with a valiant hand from of his neck his gorget teare
Of that same cocknie Phrygian knight, and drench in dust his heare. Phaer. Virgill. Æneados, b. xii.

I meet with a double sense of this word cockney, some taking it for,

1st, One coaks'd or cockered, made a wanton or nestle-cock of, delicately bred and brought up, so that when grown men or women, they can endure no hardship, nor comport with pains-taking.

2nd, One utterly ignorant of husbandry and housewifery, such as is practised in the country, so that they may be persuaded any thing about rural commodities, and the original thereof, and the tale of the citizen's son, who knew not the language of a cock, but call'd it neighing, is commonly known.—Fuller. Worthies. London.

Some again are in the other extreme, and draw this mischief on their heads by too ceremonious and strict diet, being over precise, cockney like, and curious in their observation of meats.—Burton. Anat. of Melancholy, p. 75.

The wise justice of the Almighty meant not to cockney us up with meere dainties with a loose indulgence, but hath thought fit to temper our sweets with tartnesse.
Bp. Hall, Ser. 29. Jan. 1625.

CO'CTION. Coquere, coctum, to boil.

Whose power [butter] to preserve meat buried in it, after due coction, hath been confirm'd to me upon their own observation, by an experienced officer of the English fleet that had the oversight of the provisions, and by others that had opportunity to observe it.—Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 109.

——— And though all thy mills,
Crackling o'erflow with a redundant juice;
Poor tastes the liquor; coction long demands,
And highest temper, ere it saccharine.
Grainger. Sugar Cane, b. i.

R. Brunne, p. 289.

Of the partridge and fezants we killed great store with bow and arrowes: In this place at the Harborough mouth we found great store of cod.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. iii. p. 107.

This forrage was made of beane stalkes cut downe greene as it stood before it was joynted and codded.
Holland. Plinie, b. xviii. c. 16.

He also vsed a pease-cod branch with the cods open, but the pease out, as it is vpon his robe in his monument at Westminster.—Camden. Remains. Impreses.

Yet menacing words passed from eyther, Morris threatning to bee euen wyth Lloyd's bald pate, and Lloyde would try acquittance with the others cods heade; so that they parted with tearmes of enmity.
State Trials. Robert Drewris, an. 1607.

The seeds of harts-tongue is slung or shot away by the curious contrivance of the seed-case, as in codded arsmart, only there the spring moves and curls inward, but here outward.—Derham. Physico-Theology, b. x. Note 15.

CODE, n. }
CO'DICIL. }
CO'DIX. } Lat. Caulex, formed from Caudex, the trunk of a tree; and Caudex from cædere, to cut, to hew; quia in plures secaretur tabulas crassas, because cut into many thick tables or tablets. Seneca, (de Brevitate Vitæ, c. xiii.)—Plurium tabularum contextus, Caudex apud antiquos vocabatur, unde publicæ tabulæ codices dicuntur. And thus applied to—

A collection of the various tables of the law, and to a digested body of law.

Then having learned the Hebrew tongue, and procured a copy of the Hebrew code, he added two more columns; in one the Hebrew text and letters; in the other, the same text, in Greek letters; and this he called hexapla.

Pope. Imit. of Donne, Sat. 2.

The new code of Justinian was honoured with his name, and confirmed by his royal signature: authentic transcripts were multiplied by the pens of notaries and scribes: they were transmitted to the magistrates of the European, the Asiatic, and afterwards to the African provinces; and the law of the empire was proclaimed on solemn festivals at the doors of churches.—Gibbon. Rom. Emp. vol. viii. c. 44.

This lady appears not to have forgotten that she had been celebrated for her beauty; for she directed, by a codicil to her will, that her effigies as well done in wax as could be, and dressed in coronation robes and coronet, should be placed in a case with clear crown glass before it, and should be set up in Westminster Abbey.
Malone. Life of Dryden. Additions & Emend.

Why Pliny said, this wood-writing was not an epistle, but a codicil, was because small leaves of wood covered with wax, when written on were called by his countrymen codicilli.—Warburton. Divine Legation, b. iv. Note 22.

CO'DLE, v. Probably Caudle. Fr. Chaudeau, from Chaud, in Lat. Calidus, warm. The old Fr. Cadeler, to cocker, pamper, fedle, cherish, make much of, (Cotgrave,) is perhaps of the same origin. Skinner says, coddle, (q.d.) coctulare.

To warm, to entender by warmth, by nourishing or nursing; to keep warm or in a state of warmth.

——— Dear Prince Pippin
Down with your noble bloud, or as I live,
I'll have you codled.
Beaum. & Fletch. Philaster, Act v. sc. 1.

Spa. [aside.] Fairest fair quoth'a'. So is an old rotten codded mungrell.
Ford. Fancies Chaste and Noble, Act i. sc. 2.

It [the gauva-fruit] bakes as well as a pear, and it may be coddled, and it makes good pies.
Dampier. Voyage, vol. i. c. 8.

CO'DLING. Skinner thinks that codling was a kind of early sour apple, which required codling before it could be eaten. In A.S. Cod-æppel is said by Somner to be a quince or quince-pear. Mr. Gifford,—that codling is a mere diminutive of cod, and means an involucrum or kele, and was used by our old writers for that early state of vegetation, when the fruit, after shaking off the blossom, began to assume a globular or determinate form. Codlings, in Ford, he says, were hot peas, (Gifford, B. Jonson, iv. 24.)

Mal. Not yet old enough for a man, nor young enough for a boy; as a squash is before 'tis a peascod, or a codling when 'tis almost an apple.
Shakespeare. Twelfth Night, Act i. sc. 5.

Fol. Scorn! If I be not deceived I ha' seen Summer go up and down with hot codlings.

Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iv. c. 13.

Now the managing and carrying on of this work, by the spirit's instrumental co-efficiency, requires, that they be kept together without distraction or dissipation; that so they may be ready to receive and execute the orders and commissions of the commanding faculty.
Glanvill. Vanity of Dogmatizing, c. 12.

CO-E'LDER. Co, and elder; A.S. Ældi, aldor—A fellow-elder.

The elders which are among you I exhort, who also am an elder, (1 Pet. v. 1.) He exhorts, not commands; he also is an elder, i.e. as others are. In the original it is συμπρεσβυτερος, coelder.—Trapp. Popery truly Stated, pt. i. s. 5.

CO-ELE'CTION. Co, and electio; from eligere, (e, and legere,) to take out, pick out, choose.

The bishops sent at the same time their procurators also, to plead their right of coelection, so as, foure obstacles stood at once in the pope's way, (the two elections of the monks, and the two claims of the king and prelates, hee for his royal assent, they for theyr ioynt consent in the choyse) which all must be dasht and voyded before the pope can haue his full forth.— Speed. King John, b. ix. c. 8. s. 32.

CO-E'MPTION. Co, and emptio; from emere, to buy or purchase.

See the quotation from Chaucer.

Co-empcion is to say, comen achale or buying togither.
Chaucer. Boecius, b. i.

Monopolies and coemptions of wares for resale, where they are not restrained, are great means to enrich, especially if the party have intelligence, what things are likely to come into request, and to store himself before hand.
Bacon. Essay. Of Riches.

CO-ENGA'GE. } To bind or oblige, to lay
CO-ENGA'GERS. } under, to impose upon; (sc.) a bond or obligation: in junction with, unitedly or joinedly, or in common.

I was promised by Benson, that if Sir John Gell, and their pretended friends of the country, did co-engage, I should be disengaged.—State Trials. Colonel Andrewe, an. 1650.

The oath of secrecy hath relation only to the not discovering the co-engagers in that resolution, and the resolution itself being not treason, the oath of keeping secret that resolution is not greater than the thing resolved.—Id. Ib.

CO-ENJOY. Co, in, or en, and joy. To have, to possess, use with pleasure or delight; to take delight, feel pleasure, (sc.) joinedly or unitedly, or in common with others.

Such was the gentleness of his disposition, his unwearied course in actions of virtue, that I wish my soul no other felicity, when she hath shaken off these rags of flesh, than to ascend to his, and co-enjoy the same bliss.
Howell, b. i. s. 6. Let. 7.

Warner. Albion's England, b. ix. c. 32.

If now, clear Po, that pittie be not spent,
Which for to quench his flames did once thee moue,
When the great thunderer thundred from aboue,
And to thy siluer bosome burning sent,
To pitie his coequall be content. Stirling, s. 53.

If he only talk of essences and existences, hypostases and personalities, distinctions without differences, and priority in coequalities, and unity in pluralities, and of superior prædicates of no greater extent than the inferior subjects, he may amuse himself, and find his understanding will be like St. Peter's upon the Mount of Tabor at the transfiguration.
Bp. Taylor, vol. iii. Ser. 6.

Ineffable, coequal three,
Who from non-entity gave birth
To angels and to men, to heaven and to earth,
Yet always wast thyself, and will for ever be.
Pomfret. On the General Conflagration.

And if all the extant parts of a [physical] superficies be so depressed to a level with the rest, that there is a coæquation, if I may so speak, made of all the superficial parts of a body; this is sufficient to deprive it of former roughness, and give it that contrary equality we call smoothness.
Boyle. Works, vol. iii. p. 302.

In the Nestorian controversy, the contending parties seem to have been all of one opinion as to the doctrine of the Trinity, in opposition to the Arians, and to have held the consubstantiality, coeternity, and natural coequality of the three divine persons or hypostases.
Jortin. Ecclesiastical History, an. 428.

CO-ERCE, v. }
COE'RCION. }
COE'RCIVE. }
COE'RCIVELY. }
COE'RCITIVE. } Lat. Coercere, from con, and arcere, from the Gr. Αρκε-ειν, which (Lennep) properly denotes vel aliis septo, et munimento sum vel mihi.

To keep within bounds, under restraint; to restrain, to compel.

But veryly myne intente and meanynge is onelye, that a noble chylde, by his owne natural disposition, and not by coertion, may be induced to receive perfect instruction in these sciences.—Sir T. Elyot. The Governor, b. i. c. 8.

They were gentle and remisse to a great number, and specially to such as offended by cohercion and feare, rather then of malicious heart or cnuious minde.
Grafton. Hen. VII. an. 14.

Besides that all great examples have in them something of iniquity; it were not easie to have discipline in private governments, or coercitive power in lawes, if in some cases some evil were not to be permitted to be done for the procuring some good.—Bp. Taylor. Rule of Cons. b. i. c. 5.

The power of the magistrate in punishing the transgressors of their laws of peace, and order and interest, is infinitely just; for without a coercitive power there can be no government, and without government there can be no communities of men.—Id. Ib. b. iii. c. 2.

But when there shall be such power, coercive over both parties, as shall deprive them of their private judgments in this point, then may such covenants be effectual, seeing he that performeth first, shall have no reasonable cause to doubt the performance of the other that may be compelled thereunto.—Hobbs. De Corpore Politico, pt. i. c. 2.

Next comedy appeared with great applause,
Till her licentious and abusive tongue
Waken'd the magistrate's coercive power,
And forc'd it to suppress her insolence.
Roscommon. Horace. Art of Poetry.

Therefore the debtor is ordered, on a supposition of ability and fraud, to be coerced his liberty until he makes payment.—Burke. Speech at Bristol previous to the Election.

Thus in the case before us, coercive power can only influence us to outward practice: by outward practice only is the good, which civil society aims at, immediately effected, therefore is coercive power peculiarly fitted to civil society.
Warburton. Alliance between Church & State, b. i.

The power of the government can with no appearance of reason go further coercively, than to bind and hold down those, who have once consented to their opinions.
Burke. Tracts on the Popery Laws.

CO-ESSE'NTIAL. CORSSENTIA'LITY. } Fr. Coessentiel; Sp. Coessencial; from Lat. Co, and essentia. Essence in its primary notation, says Locke, signifies being.

Essential,—contributing to, requisite or necessary to, the essence or being, unitedly, or in common with other.

All was peace with thee; thou wert one with thy coeternall and coessentiall father; all the angels worshipt thee; all the powers of heaven and earth awfully acknowledged thine infinitenesse.—Bp. Hall. Cont. The Agonie.

The Arian and Socinian are charged to dispute against the Trinity: they affirm to believe the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, according to Scripture and the Apostolic creed; as for terms of Trinity, Triniunity, Coessentiality, Tripersonality, and the like, they reject them as scholastic notions, not to be found in Scripture.—Milton. True Religion, &c.

There would have been nothing at all wanting to the Platonick Trinity, for an absolute agreement of it with the Christian, had they but accommodated the right notion of co-essentiality or consubstantiality to their three hypostases.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, p. 805.

So it appeareth, that the Son of God (co-eternal and co-essential with his father) became the Son of Man; truly and entirely partaking of the nature and substance of man.
Barrow, vol. ii. Ser. 23.

Thou sole prerogative, supreme of right,
Deep source of principle, and light of light,
Whose is will be, whose will be ever was,
Of self essential co-essential cause!
Brooke. Universal Beauty, b. iv.

CO-ESTA'BLISHMENT. Establishment, in common or in union with other establishment.

The tithes in Ireland should remain in the possession of the Protestant clergy; but a kind of co-establishment of the Catholick clergy should be admitted: for it appears to me an act of great oppression that the Catholics, who constitute a great majority of the nation, should be compelled to maintain not only their own teachers, but the teachers also of a small minority of the country.
Anecdotes of Bp. Watson, vol. ii. p. 177.

CO-ETA'NEAN, n. CORTA'NEOUS. } It. Coetaneo; Sp. Coetaneo. Con, and ætaneous, of modern formation, from Lat. Ætas. See COÆVAL.

That oath that is coetaneous, and coessential to all reasonable natures, and engages them μη παρα-βαινειν, &c. not to transgress the laws that are set them.
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 562.

And if the usual compute will hold, that men are of the same age which are born within compass of the same year, Eve was as old as her husband and parent Adam, and Cain their son coetaneous unto both.

CO-ETE'RNAL. CORTE'RNALLY. CORTE'RNITY. } Fr. Coëternel; It. and Sp. Coeterno; Lat. Co, and æternus. See ETERNAL.
Eternal, or having duration or time without either beginning or end; in union or in common with other.

Giving all praise and honour, and glory, and immortality to thee, O blessed Father, our Creator; to thee, O blessed and coeternal Son, our Redeemer, to thee O blessed and co-essentiall Spirit, our Sanctifier, one infinite God, in three most glorious and incomprehensible persons now and evermore.—Bp. Hall. Ser. Ps. cxiv. 3.

Hail, holy light, offspring of heav'n first-born,
Or of th' eternal coeternal beam,
May I express thee unblam'd!—Milton. Par. Lost, b. iii.

Whose first mists when the Light of the Nicen Councell had dispeld, it was not long ere Macedonius transferred unto God's most holy spirit the same blasphemie, wherewith Arius had already dishonoured his coeternally begotten Sonne.—Hooker. Ecclesiasticall Politie, b. v. s. 52.

23. In his prayer for his disciples, John xvii. he professeth to his Father, this is life eternal, to know thee, the only true God. But as this was meant in opposition to polytheism, so in this prayer to ver. 5. he declares his own coeternity with the Father.—Grew. Cosmo. Sacra, b. v. c. 4.

Space is not the place of all things, for it is not the place of God. Otherwise there would be a thing coeternal with God, and independent upon him, nay, he himself would depend upon it, if he had need of place.
Clark. Leibnitz's Fifth Paper.

Yet it is apparent that the Nicene fathers owned the coeternity of the Son, from the anathema annexed to their creed, wherein they condemn those who said of the Son, "that there was a time when he was not."—Bp. Bull, vol. ii. Disc. 4.

Of reason thou the coeternal cause,
Thyself all reason, and thy will all laws;
All reasoning will with pow'rful wisdom fraught.
Brooke. Universal Beauty, b. vi.

CO-E'VAL. See COÆVAL.

CO-EXI'ST, v. COEXI'STENT. COEXI'STENCE. COEXI'STENCY. } Lat. Con, and existere, (ex, and sistere,) to stand out, (oriri atque emergere, Vossius.) To stand out or exist together; to live together.

Yet neither can they have a separate, tho' a distinct existence, no more than the ideas of our own mind can have any separate existence from the mind, but have a coexistence therein.—Grew. Cosmo. Sacra, b. i. c. 1.

Though in a subject so disposed they say the sacrament by its own virtue does it; but this opinion says it does it of itself, without the help, or so much as the coexistence of any condition but the mere reception.
Bp. Taylor. The Anabaptists' Opinions considered, s. 18.

Thus he [the devil] endeavours to propagate the unbelief of witches, whose concession infers it a coexistency.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. i. c. 10.

Whereby it appears, that to the measuring the duration of any thing by time, it is not requisite that that thing should be coexistent to the motion we measure by, or any other periodical revolution; but it suffices to this purpose, that we have the idea of the length of any regular periodical appearances, which we can in our minds apply to duration, with which the motion or appearance never coexisted.
Locke. Hum. Underst. b. ii. c. 14.

I have said more than once, that I hold space to be something merely relative, as time is, that I hold it to be an order of coexistences, as time is an order of successions.
Clarke. Leibnitz's Third Paper.

But do they not know that Christ's sitting at God's right hand is not taken in a metaphysical sense, for his co-existence with it? but is only a phrase, importing God's advancing him to high distinguished honour, as princes used to place their favourites at their right hand.
South, vol. viii. Ser. 21.

Sure I am, all history doth not afford another instance of so much purity and integrity in one part, coexisting with so much decay and so many infirmities in the rest.
Warburton. The Dedication to Lord Mansfield.

CO-EXTE'ND, v. COEXTE'NSION. COEXTE'NSIVE. } Sp. Co-extendere; Lat. Co, and extendere, to stretch, to reach to.
To stretch out, as far in time or space as something else.

Unless, I say, this be said, I see not how that absurdity will be avoided, whereunto that Stoical notion of mixtion was liable, according to which the least body may be coextended with the greatest.—Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 503.

Though it [the soul] be a spirit, yet I find it is no inconvenience to have some analogy, at least of co-extension, with my body.—Hale. Origination of Mankind, p. 23.

The noblest beauties of art are those of which the effect is coextended with rational nature, or at least with the whole circle of polished life; what is less than this can be only pretty, the plaything of fashion, and the amusement of a day.—Johnson. Life of West.

This account of the six Indian seasons, each of which is coextensive with two signs, or four lunar stations and a half, places the solstitial points, as Vahara has asserted, in the first degree of Dhanishtha'.
Sir W. Jones. On Indian Chronology, Supplement.

COFFEE, n. Fr. Caffé; It. Caffè; Sp. Café. Cahoueh, according to Galand, is to loathe; this originally is applied to wine, an excess of which produces loathing; afterwards to other liquors. Dr. Douglass gives another etymology. The original Arabic, he says, is Cahouah, pronounced Cahoeh, from Cohaut, strength or vigour. It was formerly written Coffa, and Cauphe.

They have in Turkey, a drink called coffa, made of a berry of the same name, as black as soot, and of a strong scent, but not aromatical; which they take beaten into powder, in water as hot as they can drink it: and they take it, and sit at it in their coffa-houses, which are like our taverns.
Bacon. Natural History, s. 738.

He [the Turk] hath a drink called cauphe, which is made of a brown berry, and it may be called their clubbing drink between meals.—Howell, b. ii. Let. 54.

An. 1637, 1638.—He [Nath. Conopios] was the first I ever saw drink coffee, which custom came not into England till 30 years after.—Evelyn. Memoirs.

The heroe of the tragedy I saw was a journeyman-taylor, and his first minister of state a coffee-man.—Tatler, No. 20.

One of these witlings elevated his crest, by asking me in a full coffee-house the price of patches, and another whispered, that he wondered why Miss Frisk did not keep me that afternoon to watch her squirrel.—Rambler, No. 169.

COFFER, n. COFFER, v. COFFERER. } Fr. Coffre; Sp. Cofre. Coffer and coffin, though so differently applied, are the same word, differently written. (See COFFIN.) Coffer is now chiefly confined in its application to the—
Chest or box, in which gold, jewels, or other precious things are preserved or kept.

And the cofres of christendom, and the keie hethen,
And the lock of lyeue, lieth loken in her hondes.
Piers Ploughman. Crede.

He wyl kepen it hem self, and cofrene it faste.—Id. Ib.

But all be that he was a philosophere
Yet hadde he but litel gold in cofre,
But al that he might of his freinds hente,
On bokes and on lerning he it spente.
Chaucer. Prologue, v. 300.

The s'rong cofre hath all devoured,
Under the keie of avarice
The treasour of the benefice,
Whereof the poure shulden clothe,
And ete, and drinke, and house bothe.
Gower. Con. A. Prologue.

Whan they of the towne had hard that erye, they receyued the Englysshmen into their houses, and made them good chere: and some opeyned their coffers, and bade them take what them lyst, so they might be assured of thir lyues.
Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. i. c. 124.

Afterwards, euery lignage of the towne or tribe had a great cofer of cypres. Into whiche they did putt the bonnes of them, that were dead of that tribe, and they dyd cary that same cofer vpon a charratt.—Nicolt. Thucydides, fol. 54.

My hautie buildings huge to see,
my turrets and my traine,
My horse, my hounds, my cofred coine for others doe remain.—Turbervile. Epicure's Counsel.

And in his rage he instantly commands
That every English should his pris'ner kill,
Except some few in some great captain's hands,
Whose ransom might his empty coffers fill.
Drayton. The Barons' Wars, b. i.

He commanded one day his cofferer that kept his money, to give a friend of his five and twenty myryades, which the Romans call in their tongue decies, his cofferer marvelled at it, and being angry withall in his mind, brought him all this money in a heap together, to shew him what a marvelous mass of money it was. Antonius seeing it as he went by, asked what it was: the cofferer answered him, it was the money he willed him to give unto his friend.
North. Plutarch, p. 755.

The last care of the children of this world is, after all their labours to die rich. Though the thoughts of death are not very agreeable to them, yet as they must die, it is at least some consolation, if they can leave their coffers full behind them.—Gilpin, vol. iii. Ser. 4.

The cofferer and the treasurer of the chamber receive and pay great sums, which it is not at all necessary they should either receive or pay.—Burke. Speech on Econom. Reform.

COFFIN, n. } Fr. Coffin. In Scotch, caip is Co'FFIN, v. } a coffin. Knox repeatedly uses a cope of lead for a leaden coffin, which, Dr. Jamieson remarks, seems to confirm Skinner's etymon of the English coffin, from the A. S. Cofe, cofa, cavea; but, he adds, it appears doubtful whether both cope and caip do not simply signify a covering, from A. S. Coppe, the top of any thing. (See Cope.) To this it may be added, that Wiclif renders the Lat. Cophinos, coffyns. In the Modern Version it is baskets; Gr. Κοφινοι.

Coffin was also applied to "the raised crust, or cantles of pies." See the annotations upon the passages quoted from Ben Jonson and Shakespeare. Coffin is now applied to—

A chest or box, constructed for the reception of the dead.

And alle eeten and weren fulfild. And thei token the relifs of broken metis twelve coffyns ful and of the fischis.
Wiclif. Mark, c. 6.

And all the time which they mourne they keep the dead in the house, the bowels being taken out and filled with chownam or lime, and coffined, and when the time is expired they carry them out playing and piping and burn them.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. ii. pt. i. p. 263.

There is one vse and custome amongst them, which is strange and rare, but yet it is very ridiculous, and that is this: when any man dyeth amongst them, they take the dead body, and put it in a coffine or chest, and in the hand of the corps they put a little scroule, & in the same there are these wordes written, that the same man died a Russe of Russes hauing receiued the faith, and died in the same.
Id. Ib. vol. i. p. 254.

Not a flower, not a flower sweet,
On my black coffin let there be thrown,
Not a friend, not a friend greet
My poor corpse, where my bones shall be throwne.
Shakespeare. Song in Twelfth Night.

A reverend painted lady was brought,
And coffin'd in crust till now she was hoary.
B. Jonson. The Gipsies Metamorphosed.

——— If you spend
The red deere pyes i' your house, or sell 'hem forth, sir,
Cast so, that I may haue their coffins all,
Return'd here, and pil'd vp.
Id. Staple of Newes, Act ii. sc. 2.

Pet. Why thou saist true, it is a paltrie cap,
A custard coffin, a bauble, a silken pie.
Shakespeare. Taming of the Shrew, Act iv. sc. 3.

It [verse] hath no power. For mine from his black herse
Redeemes not Talbot, who, cold as the breath
Of winter, coffin'd lies.—Habington. Castara, pt. ii. El. 6.

Through yielding planks the angry bullets fly,
And of one wound, hundreds together die:
Born under different stars, one fate they have,
The ship their coffin, and the sea their grave.
Waller. Of our late War with Spain, (1651.)

When his majesty was beheaded on a scaffold joyning to the Banquetting-house at Whitehall, and his corps thereupon immediately coffin'd and cover'd with a black velvet pall.
Wood. Fasti.

Be not dismayed at the approach of pain and sickness; let not the coffin and the shroud terrify you.
Bp. Horne. The World Incarnate, Dis. 7.

The cog, or tooth of a wheel, is that which fastens or secures it; (sc.) in its regular motion. To cog a wheel is to fix such cogs; to cog a die is to load it so as to secure its fall; and hence, (or perhaps from the frauds of cogmen, see Cog, ante, and Coax,) to cog is, (met.)—

To defraud, to delude, to deceive, to falsify.

To shake the bones and cog the cruſtie dice,
To carde in care of sodaine losse of pence
Unseemely is, and taken for a vice:
Unlawful play can haue no good pretence.
Turberville. To his Friend P. Of Courting.

Lo here good reader, another manifest example of the vnhonest dealing and false cogging of these men.
Fox. Martyrs, p. 1143.

And scorn the crowd of such as cog for pence,
And waste their wealth in sinful bravery.—Drayton, Ecl. 7.

Round, and like a wry cog in the wheel; yet now, he is streighted, and set again in his way, as if he had never been out.—Feltham, pt. i. Resolve 89.

There is much cosenage of the poore people by cogged miracles, saith Cardinal Lyranus; these holy frauds could not gull men if they did not judge according to appearance.
Bp. Hall. Serm. John vii. 24.

Ray. Folly, sir! of what quality?

Co'GENCY. } compel.

Having the force of things brought together or collected, of things united; having united strength; powerful, forcible, compulsive.

Met. in argument or reasoning; convincing.

No better nor more cogent reason can be given of any thing, than that it implies a contradiction to be otherwise.
More. Immortality of the Soul, b. i. c. 4.

Which living and understanding substances, as they make incomparably the most considerable and noble part of the naturally known and visible creation: so they do the most clearly and cogently demonstrate to philosophical enquirers the necessary self-existence, and omnipotent power, and unsearchable wisdom, and boundless beneficence of their maker.—Bentley, Ser. 8.

What I have said there, I presume is enough to let others see, that I have not neglected to declare my poor sense about self-evident propositions, and the cogency and evidence of demonstrative or probable deductions of reason.
Locke. Second Reply to the Bp. of Worcester.

All those who have affections which lead them to the conservation of civil order would recognize, even in its cradle, the child as legitimate, which has been produced from those principles of cogent expediency to which all just governments owe their birth, and on which they justify their continuance.
Burke. Reflections on the French Revolution.

He which hath so aduanced vs, is our witnes, how we both day and night reuoluing in our minds, did cogitate nothing more, than how to satisfie the partes of a good pastour, in attending the health and cure of the flocke.
Fox. Martyrs, p. 780. an. 1521.

For he that calleth a thing into his mind, whether by impression or recordation, cogitateth and considereth; and he that employeth the faculty of his phansie also cogitateth; and he that reasoneth, doth in like manner cogitate or devise.
Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, b. ii. c. 13.

Heauenly cogitations were in him, who onely figured a man kneeling, with his hands lifted up to the heauens, with this inscribed: SVPREMA OPTIMA MVNDI.
Camden. Remains. Impreses.

An extreme desire did lately assail me to entertain between my other private studies, some such discourse as might work upon mine own mind, and at last abstract awhile if not elevate my cogitations above all earthly objects.
Reliquiæ Wottonianæ. To Sir Edm. Bacon.

Wherefore one of the moderne very ingeniously hath reduced all the power of the soule into motion; noteing the misprision and precipitancy of some of the ancients, who fixing their eyes and thoughts with unadvised hast upon memory, imagination, and reason, have past over the cogitative faculty untoucht; which hath a chief part in the order of conception.
Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, b. ii. c. 13.

For it is not at all conceivable, that ever there was a time when there was no intelligible nature of a triangle, nor any such thing cogitable at all.—Cudworth. Morality, b. iv. c. 4.

It [cognoscitive power of the soul] is enabled as occasion serves and outward objects invite, gradually and successively to unfold and display itself in a vital manner, by framing intelligible ideas or conceptions within itself of whatsoever hath any entity or cogitability.—Id. Ib. b. iv. c. 1.

A man has little reason, God knows, to fancy the suppositum of his life, sense, and cogitative faculties to be an independent being, when he considers how transitory and uncertain at best his life and all his enjoyments are.
Wollaston. Religion of Nature, s. 5. § 15.

First: 'tis possible to infinite power to create an immaterial cogitative substance. That there can be such a thing as a cogitative substance, that is, a substance endued with consciousness and thought, is granted by all; because every man's own experience convinces him that he himself is such a substance.—Clark. Of the Being & Attrib. of God.

If on these subjects their discourse leads them to inculcate doctrines, which not only exceed the power of speech, but even human ideas and cogitations, they then fly to allusions, similitudes, and figures.
Warburton. The Divine Legation, b. iii. s. 2.

Which atoms are still hovering up and down, and never rest till they meet with some pores proportionable and cognate to their figures, where they acquiesce.
Howell, b. iv. Let. 50.

It is true which is affirmed in the law, in pari cognationis gradu, par idemque jus statuatur: when the cognation is the same, the law is so too: that is, if it be measured in the same kind of cognation.—Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. ii. c. 2.

The wet parts of the adventitious liquor mollifie the sides of the body already baked; and, both of them being in a like temper and cognation, they easily stick and grow together.
Digby. Of Bodies, c. 14.

Two of which [vices] I shall mention, as being of near cognation to it [ingratitude] and constant coherence with it. The first of which is pride. And the second hard-heartedness, or want of compassion.—South, vol. i. Ser. 11.

COGNOSCIBI'LITY.
COGNO'SCITIVE.

Fr. Cognoisance,—knowledge, acquaintance, familiarity with; skill, cunning, experience in; a notice or notion, an intelligence, understanding, apprehension of, (Cotgrave.)

Cognizance, in our older writers, is, that by which any one may be known. See the examples from Sir T. More and Froissart.

Cognizable,—that may be known; may be noticed, censured, judged of.

Cognizor and cognizee, are common legal appellations.

For thus fortune that I of tell
With men whan her lust to dwell,
Maketh hem to lese her connisaunce
And nourisheth hem in ignorsunce.—Chaucer. R. of the R.

And man knoweth nothing, saue only by reason,
And reason in man, is diuerse of operation;
How can then man be parfite of cognicion,
For reason shall so reason that somtyme among
A man by information may ryghte wisely do wrong.
Skelton. A Treatise betwene Trouth and Information.

A worke of great erudition and elegant, and stuffed with the cognicion of many thinges worthy to be learned.
Sir T. More. Workes, p. 4.

And forasmuch as the protector gaue the bore for his cognisaunce, this dreme made so fereful an impressio in his hart, yt he was thoroughly determined no leger to tary.
Id. Ib. p. 54.

And all these cariagis were sette in voyde granges and barnes, in savegarde, and on euery manne's cariage his owne cognisaunce or armes, wherby euery mā myght knowe his owne.—Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. I. c. 16.

For which cause, men imagined, that he gaue the sunne in his full brightnes for his cognisaunce or badge.
Hall. Hen. VI. an. 39.

Part hereof hath been discovered by himself, and some by humane indagation: which, though magnified as fresh inventions unto us, are stale unto his cognition.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. I. c. 10.

This imagery and representation of the qualities of the things without, is that we call our conception, imagination, ideas, notice or knowledge of them; and the faculty or power, by which we are capable of such knowledge, is that I here call cognitive power, or conceptive, the power of knowing or conceiving.—Hobbs. Human Nature, c. 1.

And in this you must consider, first God's covenant made with the Gentiles, or the receiving them into the Church, deduced out of those words, (Acts xvii. 30.) But now commands, for all to whom God makes known his commands, are by that very cognisance known to be parts of his Church,
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 646.

For to what purpose is an authority of taking cognizance, if they have no power of giving sentence, unless it were to defer it to a superior judge, which in this case cannot be supposed!—Bp. Taylor. Liberty of Prophesying, § 6.

The high scope I drove at was, by the method I have taken, to recover to their cognoscence that noble part of their Cabbala which was lost, and yet which Pythagoras once had from their forefathers, as is abundantly testified by the suffrages of historians.
More. Appendix to Def. Philosophick Cabbala, c. 6.

Besides, there being that communication betwixt the earth and the aire, that at least the fame of things will arrive to their cognoscence that have left this life, the after ill success of their wicked enterprises and unreasonable transactions may arm their tormenting conscience with new whips and stings.—Id. Immortality of the Soul, b. iii. c. 11.

And if this were not true, it were vain that the Apostle commands us to avoid an heretick: for no external act can pass upon a man for a crime that is not cognoscible.
Bp. Taylor. Liberty of Prophesying, § 2.

Where there is more light, there is more visibility: so where there is more of entity, reality, and perfection, there is there more of conceptibility and cognoscibility.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, p. 639.

Knowledge is infinite, and out of this infinity every one snatches some things real, and some images of things; and there are many cognoscitive faculties above and below, and powers ministering to knowledge, and all these have many ways of being absurd, or hindered, and of being imperfect.
Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. i. c. 2.

Wherefore it must of necessity be granted, that besides passion from corporeal things, or the passive perception of sense, there is in the souls of men another more active principle, or an innate cognoscitive power, whereby they are enabled to understand or judge of what is received from without by sense.—Cudworth. Morality, b. iv. c. 1.

I last winter erected a court of justice for the correcting of several enormities in dress and behaviour, which are not cognizable in any other courts in this realm.—Tatler, No. 250.

Of crimes that are cognizable by courts of judicature, how few would fall under their sentence, were it not for the obligation which religion lays upon those persons to speak the truth, by whose evidence the facts in question must be proved and ascertained!
Bp. Horne. Influence of Christianity, Disc. 31.

The government claims to be strictly theocratical, and the people to be governed by it were to be made sensible, at every step, that it was so. Therefore the interesting events in their civil history were to be regarded by them as coming within the cognisance, and lying under the controul of their divine governor.—Hurd. Conclusions from the true Idea of Prophesy.

COGNOMINA'TION. } Lat. Cognomen; Con, and nomen; a COGNO'MINAL. } name. See DENOMINATE.

Cognomen is a name added to another name of a family or people, which is generally bestowed upon some individual ab eventu aliquo, and by him transmitted to his posterity, (Gesner.) And see the example from Bp. Taylor.

For therefore Christ gave him the cognomination of Cephas, απο της κεφαλης, to show that St. Peter was the visible head of the Catholick Church.
Bp. Taylor. Liberty of Prophesying, § 7.

And therefore, altho' it denied that some in the water do carry a justifiable resemblance to some at land, yet are the major part which bear their names unlike; nor do they otherwise resemble the creatures on earth, then they on earth the constellations which pass under animal names in heaven: nor the dog fish at sea much more make out the dog of the land, then that his cognominal or namesake in the heavens.—*Brown. To have, hold, or keep, a dwelling or abiding place; to dwell or abide, together with.

Whosoeuer therfore shall bee founde able of the order of deacon, subdeacon, or priesthoode, wee wyll that no such men bee prohibited to ascende the dignities aforesayd, for the cohabitation of their wyues.—Barnes. Workes, p. 322.

For he was heard in threatning wise to utter these words, I will remove and translate thee [Jupiter Capitolinus] into the lande of the Greeks until such time as being intreated (according as he told the tale himselfe) and inuited first by him for to cohabite, he made a bridge over the temple of Augustus of sacred memorie, and so joyned the palatium and capitol together.—Holland. Suetonius, p. 132.

So their disagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced into one mild temper, no small number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons in England, where great slaughter had made large room.
Raleigh. Hist. of the World, b. iii. c. 28. s. 3.

For it is no dishonour to be overcome kinsmen of kinsmen, one Dorain of another Dorain, and one Chalcidean of another of his own race; or, in sum, any one by another of us, being neighbours, and cohabiters of the same region.
Hobbs. Thucydides, b. iv.

Something I must like and love but nothing so violently as to undo myself with wanting it. If I should ever be intangled in that snare I will yet cast the worst, and prepare as well for a parting journey as cohabitation.
Feltham, pt. I. Res. 31.

That is, their portion shall be shame and an eternal prison, αφορλτωδες ρευμα, a flood of brimstone, and a cohabitation with devils to eternal ages.—Bp. Taylor, Ser. I. pt. iii.

And, on the contrary, if a Christian woman had an infidel for her husband, she should not depart from him as long as he was wiling to cohabit with her.
Sharp. Works, vol. v. Dis. 4.

All cohabitants in general run into this unhappy fault: men and their wives break into reflections which are like so much Arabic to the rest of the company; sisters and brothers often make the like figure from the same unjust sense of the art of being intimate and familiar.—Tatler, No. 225.

Wit cohabiting with Malice, had a son named Satyr, who followed him, carrying a quiver filled with poisoned arrows, which, where they once drew blood, could by no skill ever be extracted.—Rambler, No. 22.

A senator could not marry a freed woman: a free man could not marry a slave: and the cohabitation of slaves was not called by the name of marriage.
Jortin. Remarks on Eccles. Hist.

CO-HEIR. } One who inherits in conjunction
COHE'IRESS. } with another or others; one who in such conjunction takes, or is entitled to take, property of a person deceased; one, in the words of Blackstone, upon whom the law casts the estate immediately on the death of the ancestor, (Com. ii. 201.)

And then if we be the sonnes, then be we heires, heires of God, co-heires of Christ.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 700.

They have annulled the will of Tiberius, who in his testament had adioyned coheire unto him another of his nephewe under age.—Holland. Suetonius, p. 127.

He hath delivered us from the hands of Satan, hath conquered death for us, hath taken the sting out, and made it harmless and medicinal, and proclaimed us heirs of heaven and co-heires with the eternal Jesus.
Bp. Taylor, vol. ii. Ser. 12.

They are all heirs, and they are all heirs of God, and all joint heirs with Christ; not properly with one another; for if they were joint or co-heirs with one another, they must share the inheritance between them, every one taking his only proportion; whereas the inheritance of the sons of God is never divided.—Bp. Beveridge, Ser. 81.

My parents had no other child, I was therefore not browbeaten by a saucy brother, or lost in a multitude of co-heiresses, whose fortunes being equal, would probably have conferred equal merit, and procured equal regard.
Rambler, No. 62.

CO-HE'LPER. A.S. Helpan; Dut. Helpen; Ger. Helffen; to aid, succour, or assist.
A fellow-helper or assister.

To bee short, he was now come to age, he was an old man, an impotent man, not able to goe from place to place to minister justice; hee chose two suffragans, two coadiutors, two cohelpers.—Latimer. Fifth Ser. before King Edw.

CO-HERE, v. } Lat. Con, and herere; (See COHE'RENCE. } ADHERE)—
COHE'RENCY. } To hold or keep close or
COHE'RENT. } tight together, in close con-
COHE'SION. } nexion or dependency, in close succession; to stick together.

I will not speak of the coherence of these words [Isa lv. 7] for they are an entire sense of themselves, and contain in them two parts; first, the conversion of a sinner; secondly, the condition of one so converted.—Mede. Works, b. I. Dis. 34.

The cause of the coherence or consequence of one conception to another, is their first coherence or consequence at that time when they are produced by sense, as for example, from Saint Andrew the mind runneth to Saint Peter, because their names are read together; from Saint Peter to a stone, from the same cause; from stone to foundation, because we see them together; and for the same cause, from foundation to church, and from church to people, and from people to tumult: and, according to this example, the mind may run almost from any thing to any thing.
Hobbs. Of Human Nature, c. 4.

I verily believe you would not find any contradiction in his words, but confess them as coherent and consonant as any in your book.
Chillingworth. Rel. of Protestant Church, pt. I. c. 4.

Farther, if he says he knows not how he thinks; I answer, neither knows he how he is extended; how the solid parts of the body are united, or cohere together to make extension.
Locke. On Hum. Underst. b. ii. c. 23.

If yet a just coherence be not made
Between each thought, and the whole model laid
So right, that every line may higher rise,
Like goodly mountains, till they reach the skies:
Such trifles may, perhaps, of late have past,
And may be lik'd awhile, but never last.
Buckinghamshire. Essay on Poetry.

Their dark and involved sentences; their figurative and parabolical discourses; their neglect of connecting transitions, which often leaves us at a loss for the method and coherency of what they write; are qualities that our rhetoricians do not more generally dislike, than their practice.
Bayle. Works, vol. ii. p. 290.

And, while we ravish'd gaze on Nature's face,
Remark her order, and her motions trace,
The long coherent chain of things we find,
Leads to a cause supreme, a wise creating mind.
Blackmore. Creation, b. iii.

If pondrous atoms are so much in love
With this one point, that all will thither move,
Give them the situation they desire;
But let us then, ye sages, next enquire,
What cause of their cohesion can you find?
Blackmore. Creation, b. I.

Of all things, there is the greatest difficulty in retaining numbers. They are like grains of sand, which will not cohere in the order in which we place them; but by transmuting figures into letters, which easily cohere, in every form of combination, we fix and retain numbers in the mind with the same ease and certainty with which we remember words.—Priestley. On History, b. iv. Lect. 17.

COHIBITOR. Fr. Cohiber; Sp. Cohibir; Lat. Cohibere, to hold or keep together: to withhold; to restrain.

These ii persons were ever cohibetors and refreiners of the kinges wilfull skope and full libertye.

COHOBATE. } Fr. Cohober, perhaps formed
COHOBA'TION. } from the Gr. Χοεω, to pour.
Cohobation, (says Locke,) is the pouring of the liquor distilled from any thing back upon the remaining matter, and distilling it again.

When it was cohobated eight or ten times the spirit was turned into an insipid phlegm. But we went on with our cohobations forty times, to see whether it would make any alteration.—Boyle. Works, vol. vi. p. 612. Let. from Avery.

So that the juices of an animal are as it were cohobated, being excreted and admitted again into the blood with the fresh aliment.—Arbuthnot. On Aliments, c. 1. Prop. 7.

A band, or united body of soldiers.

Whole bands or cohorts, if any of them gave ground and reculed, he tithed, that is to say, executed every tenth man of them: and the rest, he allowed barly instead of wheat to feede upon.—Holland. Suetonius, p. 47.

Eight cohorts by themselves consisting of four hundred in a band were enrolled, even the most able and choice men of all others.—Id. Livius, p. 254.

Hence to the gates cast round thine eyes, and see

COI'FFURE. } Vitiis,) from Ger. Heben, levare, tollere in altum, to heave, to raise on high. Wachter gives, Haube, crista, which was subsequently applied ad mitras, and to other coverings of the head. Belgæ, he adds, dicunt huif and kuif promiscuè; for h and k are interchangeable in all dialects. The Fr. Couvrir, to cover, presents a very simple etymology.
A coife,—a cover for the head: for part of the head (the shaven part).
See Blackstone, Introd. § 1. Note t.

Wherefore first I dyd throwe away my quylted cappe, and my other close bonnettes, and onely dyd lye in a thynne coyfe, whiche I haue euer sens vsed both wynter and somer.
Sir T. Elyot. Castel of Helth, b. iv.

Judges of the kinge's lawes
He countes them foles and dawse,
Sergeauntes of the coyfe eke,
He sayeth they are to seke.
Skelton. Why come ye not to Court?

Ouer that her cappe, (made after the coife fashion of cloth of gold) called Shapka Zemska, edged with some riche furre, and set with pearle and stone.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 497.

Then after the said Archbishop had blessed the Quene's corone, [Queen of Hen. VII.] seing, Oremus Deus fuorum, he sett the crowne uppon her hede, whereupon was a coyff, put by my said lady for the conservation of the holy unction, whiche is afterwarde to be delyverede unto the saide Archebishop.—Leland. Collectanea, vol. iv. p. 224. Coronation of Lady Elizabeth.

I must therefore repeat it, that I am pleased with the coiffure now in fashion, and think it shews the good sense which at present very much reigns among the valuable part of the sex.—Spectator, No. 98.

And when th' invidious hand of time
By stealth shall silver o'er my head,
Still pleasure's rosy walks I'll tread,
Still with the jocund Muses rhyme,
And haunt the green Idalian bow'rs,
Whilst wanton boys of Paphos' court
In myrtles hide my staff for sport,
And coife me, where I'm bald, with flow'rs.
Cooper. The Call of Aristippus, Epis. 4.

At once, in bright procession spied,
The female world was at my side.
From point, and saucy ermine, down
To the plain coif, and russet gown.

COIL, v. The Fr. Cuellir; It. Cogliere, to gather: from the Lat. Colligere, is the common etymology. It may be connected with, to coll, to embrace.
To gather together; to twine or roll into spires or circles, into rings.

2 Sold. We have seen the fight, sir,
Nov. Yes: coil'd up in a cable, like salt eels.
Beaum. & Fletch. The Knight of Malta, Act II. sc. 1.

——— Mazy still
We trod through dusky bowels of a rock,
While our conductor gather'd, as he stepp'd,
A clue, which careful in his hand he coil'd.
Glover. Athenaid b. xix.

COIL, v. } The Ger. Kollern, seu kolleren,
COIL, n. } increpare, objurgare; and this from the noun koller, (q.d.) to seize any one by the collar, is the etymology usually accepted from Skinner. Lye thinks the noun coil may be from the preceding verb; and applied a strepitu, qui fit glomerando.—The Dut. and Ger. Quellen, and wellen, (A. S. Weallan, weallian, and Eng. Well,) are ebullire, to spring out as a well or spring; and then æstuare, fervere. Somner says, "Weallan, to be very angry, to be rough, and troublous, to rage; it. to breake or burst out, to seethe, to boil." The consequential usage (placed first by Somner) is obvious from the primitive, and very well accounts for quoile, (as Lye in Junius writes the verb) coyle or coil, as applied in English, (sc.)—
To make any bubbling, bustling, confused, stir, or noise.

For whan they hadde sore coyled hym and had reuiled hym with muche despyteous language, they sent hym also empty home to hys lorde.—Udal. Luke, c. 20.

He is as hote as any man at spoile,
But at a breache he keepeth no such coyle.
Gascoigne. The Fruites of Warre.

He challeng'd me; and heere began the broile:
He thought with banding braue to keep the coile,
And that because mens iudgment fauour'd me.
Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 127.

Hales, set by himself, most gravely did smile,
To see them about nothing keep such a coil:
Apollo had spied him, but, knowing his mind,
Passt by and call'd Faulkland, that sat just behind.
Suckling. A Sessions of the Poets.

And now and then sweet Philomel would wail,
Or stock-doves plain amid the forest deep,
That drowsy rustled to the sighing gale;
And still a coil the grasshopper did keep;
Yet all these sounds yblent inclined all to sleep.
Thomson. The Castle of Indolence, c. 1.

To tame each hydra of the soul,
Each lurking pest, which mocks its birth,
And ties its spirit down to earth,

Addison. To Sir G. Kneller. On his Picture of the King.

Cheapness of coinage in England, where it costs nothing, will indeed make money be sooner brought to the mint, than any where else; because there I have the convenience of having it made into money for nothing.
Locke. Considerations of Interest, &c.

For though the schools have introduc'd animalitas, humanitas, corporietas, and some others, yet they hold no proportion with that infinite number of names of substances, to which they never were ridiculous enough to attempt the coining of abstract ones.—Id. Hum. Underst. b. iii. c. 8.

It may not be improper to prefix an explanation of some uncommon terms, which I shall be obliged to use, as well as others which I have been under the necessity of coining.

Imitation supposes a copy, and those are two terms of a relation, and cannot be coincident, as, like is not the same.
Bp. Taylor. On Repentance, c. 7. s. 5.

I cannot forbear to denote the strange coincidence that there is between Scripture expressions in this matter, some main strokes of the orthodox doctrine, and this philosophical conjecture of the state and place of the wicked
Glanvill. The Pre-existence of Souls.

XII. If a rational being, as such, is under an obligation to obey reason, and this obedience or practice of reason, coincides with the observation of truth, these things plainly follow.—Wollaston. Religion of Nature, s. 3.

Those who discourse metaphysically of the nature of truth, as to the reality of the thing, affirm a perfect coincidence between truth and goodness; and I believe it might be easily made out, that there is nothing in nature perfectly true but what is also really good.—South, vol. vii. Ser. 5.

The latter of these may be owing to the will or efficacy of a prior cause, but the former cannot, except we shall maintain with our author, that cause and effect may be co-eval, i. e. co-incident, or the very same thing.—Law. Enquiry, c 5.

To support this, a view is given to the universal dispensation of God to man as a religious agent: and the coincidency and dependence of his several revelations to him are explained and illustrated.

Warburton. App. to the first Edit. of the Alliance, (1736.)

I venerate the man whose heart is warm,

COIT, v. } See Quoit. Dr. Jamieson
Coit, n. } thinks that to coit, is to butt, to Coi'ting. } justle; and derives the word from the Isl. Kueita, violentor jactare. The primitive meaning, then, will be—
To toss, to throw, to cast. And a coit or quoit—
Any thing tossed, thrown, or cast.
But more probably this is merely consequential usage.
The word Coit or Quoit seems to be to hit or cut; the object of the thrower being to cut into the ground as close to the pin as he can.

I am called Chyldhod, in play is all my minde,
To cast a coyte, a cockstele, and a ball.

Sir T. More. Workes.

I will not speak of coiture,
Nor of conception, naither
It fits I should, for never made
I grandsier of my father.

Warner. Albion's England, b. v. c. 27.

Now on this side of the equator, that extream which is next to the earth is animated into the north, and the contrary into the south; so that in coition it applies itself quite oppositely, the coition or attraction being contrary to the vertuity or direction.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. ii. c. 2.

CO-JU'ROR. A fellow juror, or swearer. The example sufficiently explains the usage.

The solemn forms of oaths: of a compurgator, or conjuror, which kind of oath was very much used by the Anglo-Saxons. The form of this oath is this, "I swear by God, that the oath which N. swore was honest and true"

COLLA'TE, v. Colla'ting, n. Colla'tive, Colla'tor. Colla'tion. } Lat. Collatus, past part. of Conferre, (latum, from tolo, tolatum, tlatum, latum. Voss. de Anal. c. 37.) Fr. Collationner; It. Collazionare, to collate (a book).

To bring together, to bring into a state for examination and comparison, and thus to compare; also to bring together or collect,—to confer.

Philosophy (says Cicero) consists ex collatione rationum, (Tusc. iv. 38,) and by our early writers, collation is applied to—

Discourses, comparing or examining one thing by another,—to a conference. See also the usage explained by Blackstone, in the example quoted below.

A collection of various articles for repast or refreshment is also called a collation. Also when each individual confers or collates his share. See the quotation from Udal.

Than wol I, quod this markis softely,
That in thy chamber, I, and thou, and she,
Have a collation, and wost thou why?

Chaucer. The Clerkes Tale, v. 8201.

The vice of supplantation,
With many a fals collacion,
Which he conspireth all vnknowe,
Full ofte tyme hath overthrowe
The worship of another man.—Gower. Con. A. b. ii.

Here haue ye hard good deuout Christen people, a pece of Tyndale's deuote godly collacion, in which the man is not so farre fallen into deuocion, but he is much forther fallē from his wit.—Sir T. More. Works, p. 529.

And such banketes are called collacions, a collatum, tu, That is of laying together every one his porcion.

Udal. Flowers, p. 75.

And the archebysshoppe of Canterbury sang the masse; and after masse, ye bisshoppe made a collacyon.

Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, c. 101.

Than he thynkynge this reporte to be true, anon with great deuocion began there a colecion, and therof when he came to the ende, the stonys by dyuyne power, in lykenes of a great multitude of people, sayd, "Amen."—Fabyan, c. 169.

Tenthlie, for mandats granted by the pope to ordinaries, whereof euery ordinarie, if he haue the collation or presentation of ten, maie receiue one mandat.—Fox. Martyrs, p. 3.

Thou wilt not alter the foundation
Thy ancestors have laid, of this estate,
Nor grieve thy land with innovation,
Nor take from us more than thou will collate.

Daniel. Panegyrick to the King.

Because those heretical bishops being deposed and reduced into lay-communion, could not therefore collate baptism for their want of holy orders, as appears in S. Basil's Canonical Epistle to Amphilochius, where he relates their reason, and refutes it not.—Bp. Taylor. The Office Ministerial.

But, alas! he had been fasted
With a spiritual collation,
By our frugal mayor,
Who can dine on a prayer,
And sup on an exhortation.—Denham. News from Colch.

1658. May 20. I went to see a coach race in Hide Park, and collation'd in Spring Garden.—Evelyn. Memoirs.

After his [Henry Bagshaw] return, he was made chaplain to Rich. Archbishop of York, was collated to the Prebendary of Barnby in the cathedral church there, on the death of Robert Banning, the 12th of Aug. 1667.—Wood. Athen Oxon.

So such passages, as I am speaking of, in the law, the prophets, and the gospel, at first survey appear very distinct things, but upon a second inspection, and the access of more light, from an attentive collation of things, they do all, as it were, vanish into Christ; of whom (to use an Apostle's terms) Moses in the law and the prophets did write, and at whom those types, and those predictions pointed.

Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 278.

Survivances and reservations in bulls were never to be admitted; only one benefice might be reserved from a collator of ten, and two from one of fifty.

Burnet. History of Reformation, an. 1536.

In this way, indeed, the materials will be ready prepared to my hands, but the collating of the several historians will be a work of great labour.—Melmoth. Pliny, b. v. Let. 8.

From this time Pope became an enemy to editors, collators, commentators, and verbal criticks; and hoped to persuade the world, that he miscarried in this undertaking only by having a mind too great for such minute employment.—Johnson. Life of Pope.

When the ordinary is also the patron, and confers the living, the presentation and institution are one and the same act, and are called a collation to a benefice.

Blackstone. Commentaries, b. i. c. 11.

An advowson collative is where the bishop and patron are one and the same person; in which case the bishop cannot present to himself; but he does by one act of collation or conferring the benefice the whole that is done in common cases, by both presentation and institution.—Id. ib. b. ii. c. 3.

COLLA'TERAL, adj. Colla'teral, n. Colla'terally. } Lat. Con, and latus, lateris, the side. Fr. Collateral, not direct, It. Collaterale; Sp. Colateral.

Not immediately dependent upon, or derived from, but so connected, or conjoined, as to give and confer additional force, strength, or security. Connected, conjoined, concurrent.

And a collateral comfort.—Piers Ploughman, p. 270.

With many a blustering blast he seemed to have beene tossed, which painted an horizon with all the cardinall and collaterall windes blowing, and in the middes RAPIUNTQUE PERUNTQUE.—Camden. Remains. Impreses.

And in a word, all, or most of the kings have their beginnings placed in some other year of their collaterals than the Scriptures have determined.

Raleigh. History of the World, b. ii. c. 20. s. 6.

But man by number is to manifest
His single imperfection, and beget
Like of his like, his image multiplie,
In unity defective, which requires
Collateral love, and dearest amity.

Milton. Paradise Lost, b. viii.

But I said, conscience relies not upon the will [directly] yet it cannot be denied, but the will hath force upon the conscience collaterally and indirectly.

Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. i. c. 1.

The chancellor, [Hyde] who had procured his daughter to be married to the Duke of York, and was therefore suspected of having made the match with the Infanta of Portugal, that he might make way for the succession of the collateral line, sent for the Duke of Richmond.

Ludlow. Memoirs, vol. iii. p. 169.

Add to this, that when words denote time, not collaterally, but principally, they cease to be verbs, and become either adjectives or substantives.—Harris. Hermes, b. i. c. 6.

COLLA'UD, v. Fr. Collauder; Lat. Collaudare, con, and laudo, from laus, laudis; for which the Latin etymologists offer three unsatisfactory etymologies. Tooke thinks laus is A.S. Hlios, the past part. of hliosan, celebrare, to celebrate.

To laud or praise in unison with others.

For though we live among the tongues of praise,
All troops of smoothing people that collaud
All that we do: yet 'tis within our hearts
Th' ambushment lies, that evermore betrays
Our judgments, when ourselves become t' applaud
Our own ability, and our owne parts.

Daniel. To Lady Anne Clifford.

Let all thy fragrant flowers
Grow sweeter by this air;
Thy tallest trees and bowers
Bud forth and blossom fair;
Beasts wild and tame
whom lodgings yield
house, dens or field,
Collaud his name.

Hewett. Letters, b. i. s. 5. A Gradual Hymn, &c.

COLLE'AGUE, n. Colle'ague, v. Co'lleagueship. } Fr. Collègue; It. Collega; Sp. Colega; Lat. Collegæ, quod una lecti sint, id est, creati. Malim tamen a com et lex, quod iisdem legibus aliquid agant, (Martinius;) because chosen or elected together, or rather because they act under the same laws (legrs).

One chosen to act in unison with another; or, one acting under the same laws; the same rules or orders, in the same service, office, or employment with another.

They would geue no more place to the fruites of infidelitie then S. Paule gaue to Peter hys colleague, when he left the table of the Gentiles and went to the Jews.

Frith. Workes, p. 61.

The king's pleasure is, that ye then proceed to the protestations mentioned in the first instructions given to Mr Stevins, for you and the residue of your colleagues.

Burnet. Records, b. ii. No. 22. Concerning Divorce.

Colleagued with a dreame of his aduantage;
He hath not fayl'd to pester vs with message
Importing the surrender of those lands
Lost by his father.—Shakespeare. Hamlet, Act i. sc. 2.

Hence like a lusty flood, most absolutely free,
None mixing then with me, as I do mix with none,
But scorning a colleague, nor near me any one,
To Neptune's court I come.—Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 29.

These great saints [Paul and Barnabas] joined by nature, friendship, religion, high providence, and revelation, could not so govern a casual difference, a sudden passion, but must in wisdom divide from the outward duties of a friendship, or a colleagueship in the same family, or in the same journey, lest it should grow to a worse division.

Milton. Of Nullities in Marriage.

Being yet very young, (says Plutarch,) I was joined in commission with another in an embassy to the Proconsul, and my colleague, falling sick, was forced to stay behind; so that the whole business was transacted by me alone.

Dryden. The Life of Plutarch.

—— Pisander; who in days of yore
From old Amyclæ to the Lesbian shore
And Tenedos, colleagued in high command
With great Orestes, led th' Æolian band.

COLLE'CT, v. Co'llect, n. Colle'ctedly. Colle'ctedness. Colle'ctible. Colle'ction. Colle'ctive. Colle'ctively. Colle'ctor. Colle'ctory. Colle'ctorship. } Fr. Colliger, collecte, collection; It. Colletta, collezione; Sp. Colegar, colecta, coleccion; Lat. Collectum, past part. of colligere; from con, and legere, (Gr. Λεγειν,) to gather.

To gather, or put together; to bring, or bear into one place; one mass, or heap, or sum.

To gather, or bring together, things dispersed; (met.) as to collect the thoughts; resume command over them; to collect one thought from or in consequence of another; to infer one from another; to confer, to compare.

For Church Collects, see the example from Comber.

As we haue take in hand to collect and set forth his whole workes togither, so we thought it not vnconuenient, to collects likewise some briefe notes concerning the order of his lyfe and godly conuersation.—Tyndall. Life, by Fox.

It is also ordened that the collects for the preservation of the King and Queen by name, be from henceforth comunely and usuallie used and sayed in every cathedrall churche, &c.—Burnet. Records. An Order for Preaching, and Bidding of the Beades.

And against the next day of collection [the parish clerk] shall hang up somewhere in the church in open place, to the intent the poor having knowledge therby, by whose charity and alms they be relieved, may pray for the increase and prosperity of the same.—Burnet. Records. Injunctions given by the King's Majesty's Visitors, &c.

But wee saye, There is no case in religion so darke, and doubtefull, but it maie necessarily be either proued or reproued by collection, and conference of the Scriptures.
Jewell. Defence of the Apologie, p. 58.

Nowe I pray you iudge of the sequele of these reasons; and compare them with T. C. his waywarde collection, and tell me truely whether he dealeth simply or no.
Whitgift. Defence of the Answer, p. 28.

These payd the pence gathered to the bp; and the bp payd to the collector, and had his acquietance, by the name of Peter-pence.
Strype. Mem. Instruct. to Ld. Privy Seal, &c. No. 79.

Therefore I watch'd thy footsteps from that hour,
And follow'd thee still on this vast wild;
Where by all best conjectures I collect
Thou art to be my fatal enemy.—Milton. Par. Reg. b. iv.

The whole evolution of times and ages, from everlasting to everlasting, is collectedly and presentifickly represented to God at once, as if all things and actions were at this very instant, really present and existent before him.—More.

The soul is of such subtlety,
And close collectedneese.
Id. Song of the Soul, pt. iv. c. 3. s. 17.

If he be much our superior; tis good to do it sometimes in parables; as Nathan did to David. So let him by collection, give himself the censure.
Feltham, pt. I. Res. 8. Reprehension.

But the place is very obscure, and whether thereby be not meant the river Euphrates, is not without good controversie, as is collectible from the subsequent words.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. vi. c. 8.

The difference of their concretion is collectible from their dissolution, which being many wayes performable in ice, is few ways effected in crystal.—Id. Ib. b. ii. c. 1.

But he that after a patient continuance in well doing, adds charity or martyrdome to the collective body of his other graces, he hath made them perfect with this kind of perfection.—Bp. Taylor. On Repentance, c. 1. s 3.

Of this oak, or rather collectively Quercetum or oaken-holt of Sichem, is twice mention made elsewhere in Scripture.
Mede. Works, b. i. Disc. 18.

To these eight or any five of them was intrusted the full and free administration of the whole rents and duties pertaining to the officers of controllery and collectory, resigned and committed by the four officers in his majesty's hands.
Spotswood. Church of Scotland, an. 1595.

For it is easy to be collected, from what has been said, that confessing our sins, in this manner, is, in the reason of the thing, a point so necessary, that we are no ways qualified for the obtaining forgiveness of them without it.
Sharp. Ser. vol. v. Disc. 6.

[They] are generally so exactly suted to them [the epistle and gospel] that some think they take their name from being collected out of those parts of Holy Writ. But the use of the word in the Bible and the Fathers, being applied to denote the gathering together of the people in religious assemblies, thence some ritualists say, The collects are prayers made among the people collected or gathered together. Others think they are named collects because of their comprehensive brevity, because the priest in them sums up the desires of the people in a little room. I may add, in this variety, my own conjecture, that these prayers have been named collects from their being used so near the time of making the collection before the Holy Communion.
Comber. A Companion to the Temple, pt. I s. 20.

And Thomas Sternhold, one of the King's servants set forth his Psalms; being a collection of some of David's Psalms.—Strype. Memoirs. Edw. VI. an. 1553.

You will find that no law can restrain or tie up the supreme authority of a nation, but what ought to restrain and tie up the whole collective body, supposing it possible for that whole body to meet, and hear, and determine the same causes, before one written or customary law in being; because the body representative is in effect that body collective as to its powers and privileges.
Hoadly. Works. Political Pieces, vol. iii. p. 116.

But then, tho' these names being put in the singular number, seem to denote some single evil spirit, that bears ill-will to mankind; yet we are always to remember, that they are to be expounded collectively, that is to say, to signify the whole body of these apostate spirits, of which there are a vast number.—Sharp, vol. iii. Ser. 4.

But the King of Great Britain obeys no other person; all other persons are individually, and collectively too, under him, and owe to him a legal obedience.
Burke. On the French Revolution.

Not that I shall make a merit with you in having perused these barbarous volumes myself; much less would I impose the ungrateful task upon you. Thanks to the curiosity of certain painful collectors, this knowledge may be obtained at a cheaper rate.
Hurd. Works. On Chivalry and Romance, Let. 4.

In one collectorship out of twenty-four, and that by no means the largest or best cultivated, there have lately been found, by an actual enumeration, a million and three hundred thousand native inhabitants; whence it should seem that in all India there cannot now be fewer than thirty millions of black British subjects.
Sir W. Jones. Tenth Anniversary Discourse.

COʹLLEGE. } It. Collegio; Sp. Colegio; Fr. Collége. As Colleague (qv.) is applied

COLLEʹGIATE, adj. } collectively, to—
COLLEʹGIATE, n. }

A number of persons acting or living under the same laws, the same rules or orders; applied more especially to those who devote themselves to learning or religion.

Collegian is written by Bale—Colligener.

Brother Skelton your endeuorment
So haue ye done, that meretoriously
Ye haue deserued to haue an empeirment
In our collage aboue the sterry skye.
Skelton. The Crown of Laurell.

For what thou makest an hospitall, that will he shortly make a colledge of priestes, or a place of religion, or what he lusteth.—Tyndall. Workes, p. 359.

Next vnto that, they enacted, that no archdeacō, (they spake of no bishoppes,) priest, deacon, subdeacon, colligener, nor canon, shoulde from thence fourthe marry a wife.
Bale. English Votaries, pt. iii.

King Richard the III. endowed this colledge [Saint Margaret and Saint Barnard, commonly called Queen's] with 500 markes the yeere lands.—Stow. Vniuersitie, p. 954.

On barbed steeds they rode in proud array,
Thick as the college of the bees in May,
When swarming o'er the dusky fields they fly,
New to the flowers and intercept the sky.
Dryden. The Flower and the Leaf.

Dr. Haywood was buried in the collegiate church of S. Peter at Westminster, near to the bottom of the stairs leading up to the pulpit.—Wood. Athenæ Oxon.

If we consult the collegiates of Morefields, we shall find most of them are beholden to their pride for their introduction into that magnificent palace.—Tatler, No. 127.

When we consider the greatness of our wants in this kind, we should be tempted to wish for a college, destined for the supplial of a sufficient number of able missionaries in constant succession, brought up from their early youth in such a discipline as may be judged best fitted for such a service.
Warburton, vol. x. Ser. 20.

See on each page her beauteous volume bear
The golden characters of good and fair.
All human knowledge (blush collegiate pride!)
Flows from her works, to none that reads denied.
Langhorn. Enlargement of the Mind, Ep. 1.

COʹLLET, n. Mid. Lat. Colletus, collare, (Du Cange.) Fr. Collet, "the throat or fore part of the neck; also the collar of a jerkin," &c. (Cotgrave.) From the Lat. Collum, the neck. Minshew says, "The collet or beazil of a ring. It seems to have the name (q.) Collar; for as the collar doth compasse the necke, so doth the collet the stone in the ring."

Also the small collar or band worn by the inferior Romish Clergy.

How loaded hives are with their honey fill'd,
From divers flowers by chymic bees distill'd!
How full the collet with his jewel is,
Which, that it cannot take by love, doth kiss.
Cowley. Upon the Blessed Virgin.

A great genius must tread in unbeaten paths, and deviate from the common road of life: otherwise, surely a diamond of so much lustre (Stella) might have been publickly produced, although it had been fixed within the collet of matrimony.—Orrery. On Swift, Let. 2.

COLLIʹDE. } Fr. Collision; Lat. Collidere,
COLLIʹSION. } (from con, and lædere)—
To dash, or strike against.

The outward [ayre] being strucke or collided by a solid body, still strikes the next ayre.
Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 274.

To the sound, which is a collision of the ayre, three things are required; a body to strike, as the hand of a musician; the body strucken, which must be solid and able to resist; as a bell, lute string; nor wooll, or spunge, the medium, the ayre.—Id. Ib.

So may wee truly say, before Luther arose and awakened the world, divines spoke and wrote more loosely than since they haue done: the sparks of truth being forced out of contention, as the sparks of fire are out of the collision of the flint and steele.—Hakewill. Apologie, p. 237.

—— The flints that hide
The seeds of fire, thus tost'd in air collide.
Dryden. Ovid. Metam. b. xv.

Such were Cyanean isles, when Typhis steer'd,
Betwixt their straits, and their collision fear'd.—Id. Ib.

The alliance between church and state; in which we pretend to have discovered a plain and simple truth, of the highest concernment to civil society, long lost and hid under the learned obscurity arising from the collision of contrary false principles.—Warburton. Divine Legation, b. ii.

COʹLLIER, n. } See Coal.
COʹLLIERY. } A worker or labourer among coals; a dealer in them; also, a vessel that conveys or carries them.

As the sayinge is, lyke wyl to lyke, as the deuyl fyndeth out the colyer.—Bale. Apology, p. 93.

So broad her mouth was: as she stood and cride,
She tore her elvish knots of hayre, as blacke
And full of dust as any collyer's sacke.
Browne. Britannia's Pastorals, b. ii. s. 1.

Letters, that 100 colliers were gone with a convoy to London.—Whitelock. Memoirs, an. 1652, September.

He could transform himself in colour
As like the devil as a collier;
As like as hypocrites, in show,
Are to true saints, or crow to crow.—Hudibras, pt. i. c. 2.

The collieries on the Tyne lay exposed for several miles, and could not be preserved at a great charge, and with a great force.—Burnet. Own Time, an. 1707.

Consult his person, dress and air,
He seems, which strangers well might swear,
The master, or by courtesy
The captain of a colliery.—Churchill. Duellist, b. iii.

COʹLLIGATE. } Lat. Colligare, (con and COLLIGAʹTION. } ligare, Gr. Λεγ-ειν, to bind.)
To bind together.

All the members of their church are so colligated and bound together in a kind of subjection and subordination to one head, that you shall seldom hear of any contention among them that ever breaks out into open flames
Gaelch. Church Customs vindicated, (1636,) p. 8.

These therefore the midwife cutteth off, contriving them into a knot close under the body of the infant; from whence ensueth that tortuosity or complicated nodosity we usually call the navel; occasioned by the colligation of vessels before mentioned.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. v. c. 5.

The more blessed colligation of the kingdoms, than that of the roses, we owe to the happiness of your father, who even for that alone were to be remembered ever with highest veneration.—Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 143.

COʹLLINE. Lat. Collis; Fr. Colline. A little hill.
A small hill; a mount.

Near to that sweet and odoriferous clime,
Where the all-cheering emperor of time
Makes spring the cassia, nard, and fragrant balme,
And every hill and collin crowns with palms.
Drummond. The Shadow of the Judgment.

It [Audley End] has also a bowling alley, a nobly wall'd, wooded, and water'd park, full of fine collines and ponds.—Evelyn. Memoirs. September, 1654.

COʹLLIQUATE, v. } Lat. Colliquere, (con,

COLLIQUAʹTION. } To melt together; to COLLIʹQUATIVE. } melt or dissolve. Fr.
COLLIQUEFAʹCTION. } Colliquation,—
A consumption of the radical humour, or substance of the body. Also a melting, resolving, or dissolving.

But ice will dissolve in any way of heat; for it will dissolve with fire; it will colliquate in water, or warme oyl.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. ii. c. 1.

For simply all goods are not common amonge all friends, but those only who being severed apart in body, conjoyn and colliquate as it were per force, their souls together, neither willing nor beleeving that they should be twain but one.
Holland. Plutarch, p. 941.

That which is congulated by a fiery siccity, will suffer colliquation from an aqueous humidity.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. ii c. 1.

Such a broth or sipping is this, as there is not in the world a more soveraigne restorative for all colliquations and consumptions whatsoever, nor that will sooner set upon their feet againe those who be farre gone and spent that way.
Holland. Pliny, b. xxii. c. 25.

The getting forth, or spreading of the spirits, (which is a degree of getting forth) hath five differing operations. If the spirits be detained within the body, and move more violently, there followeth colliquation: as in metals, &c
Bacon. Natural History, § 328.

After the incorporation of metals by simple colliquefaction, for the better discovery of the nature and consents and dissents of metals, it should be likewise tried by incorporating of their dissolutions.—Bacon. Physiological Remains.

And thus Agricola in divers places informs us, when copper, or the ore of it is colliquated by the violence of the fire with calmia, the sparks, that in great multitudes do fly upwards, do some of them stick to the vaulted roofs of the furnaces, in the form of little and (for the most part) white bubbles.—Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 481.

The tender consistence renders it more colliquable and consumptive.—Harvey. On Consumptions.

And so when sand and ashes are well melted together and suffered to cool, there is generated by the colliquation that sort of concretion we call glass.—Boyle. Works, vol. iii. p. 32.

A colliquative fever is such as is attended with a diarrhœa, or sweats, from too lax a contexture of the fluids.—Quincy.

COʹLLOCATE, v. } Fr. Colloquer, Collocation; It. Collocazione; Lat. Collocatus, past part. of Collocare, (from con, and locare)— CoʹLLOCATE, adj.
CoLLOCAʹTION.

To place together; to put, set, station together.

In which doing beside the laud and praise that ye shall consecute thereby of all good men, we shall so have your acquitals in our remembrance, as ye shall have cause to think your travels, pains and studies herein in the best wise collocate and employed — Burnet. Records, b. ii. No. 28. The King, to his Ambassadors, 1529.

When he had perfighte knowledge where the earle with his armye was sotournevnge, he hauynge continuall repaire of his subiectes to hym, beganne incontynently withoute delaie to marshall and collocate in order his battailes (lyke a valyaunt capteine and politique leader)
Hall. Rich. III. an. 3.

They supposed their Gods by the power of spells and magical consecrations to be retained and shut up in their temples, as birds in a cage, or the devil in a circle, that so their suppliants might know where to have them when they had occasion to seeke unto them; and that, for such retaining or circumscribing of them in a certain place, an idol was necessary as the centre of their collocation.
Mede. Works. Objections Answered, b. ii.

We have not this assistance as to the accusative, which in modern languages (a few instances excepted) is only known from its position, that is to say, it being subsequent to its verb, in the collocation of the words.
Harris. Hermes, b. ii. c. 4.

With respect to your style, if elegance consists in the choice and collocation of words, you have a most indubitable title to it, for you have on all occasions selected the most appropriate expressions, and have given to them the most beautiful arrangement: and this is almost the greatest praise, which a composition can claim.
Sir W. Jones. To R. Orme.

COLLOʹGUE, v. } Fr. Colloque; It. Colloquio; Sp. Coloquio; Lat. Colloqui, to speak together, to parley; con, and loqui, to speak, (is loquitur, qui suo loco quodque verbum sciens ponit, Varro, lib. v.) As generally applied, to colloque is—CoLLOʹGUING, adj.
CoLLOʹQUY.

CoʹLLOQUIST.
CoʹLLOCUTOR.

To confer, or converse; with deceitful or delusive designs.

Colloquy,—a conference, conversation, or discourse together.

If [a mistaken notion of Divine goodness meets] with more soft and timerous natures, men of base and slavish minds, it puts such men on to flatter and collogue with him [the Deity] and to propitiate his favour by their zeal in lesser matters.—Bp. Wilkins. Of Natural Relig. b. i. c. 14.

Such base flattery, stupend parasiticall fawning and collogueing, &c. brawles, conflicts, desires, contentions, it would aske an expert Vesalius to anatomize every member.
Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 74.

It is a good mark of a spurious epistle (whereof we have good store, devised by collogueing knaves, and fathered on the first popes) when any of them talketh in an imperious strain, or arrogateth such a power to himself.
Barrow. Of the Pope's Supremacy, s. 19.

In 1540 he [Symon Gryne] was joined, as an assistant, to Ph. Melancthon, Mart. Bucer, Jo. Calvin, &c. when they went to Wormes, to the colloquy there about religion.
Wood. Athenæ Oxon.

In the midst of this divine colloquy he was commanded to look down on the plain below.—Spectator, No. 237.

And in his book de Legibus Cicero brings in his collocutor, saying, Sit igitur hoc a principio persuasum, &c. i. e. Let this be what every member of the commonwealth is fully convinced of from the beginning, that the Gods are lords and governours of all things, &c.
Derham. Astro-Theology, b. viii. c. 3.

He has taught Samson the tales of Circe, and the Syrens, at which he apparently hints in his colloquy with Delilah.
Rambler, No. 140.

Ye powers who rule the tongue, if such there are,
And make colloquial happiness your care,
Preserve me from the thing I dread and hate,
A duel in the form of a debate.—Cowper. Conversation.

The colloquists in this dialogue being all real persons, though concealed under feigned names, as Dryden has hinted in the introduction, we are prompted by that curiosity which delights in the investigation and discovery of literary secrets, to try whether by some circumstance or other the persons whom he had here in contemplation, may not be ascertained.
Malone. Life of Dryden.

COʹLLOP, n. The Fr. Charbonnée is a carbonado (qv.) or collop. Charbonner, is to collow, or make black with a coal, (Cotgrave.) As carbonado, from charbonnée, so collop (by corruption) from the obsolete collow, to colly, (qv.) or make black with a coal. And then applied to—

Any thing of similar form and shape to a collop; i. e. a piece (to be dressed on the coals).

Bust. Safe? do you hear? take notice what plight you find me in, if there want but a collop or a steek o'me, look to't.—Beaum. & Fletch. Maid of the Mill, Act iv. sc. 1.

They were driven to use great extremity to the poor souldiers (which had travelled sore and taken great pains in the wars) to make them restore back such a collop out of their gain, and the rather, because many of them had already spent it every peny.—North. Plutarch, p. 116.

I heare also that some other flitches haue foregone the like collops, but let such matters be scanned by men of more discretion.—Holinshed. Description of England, c. 2.

Because he hathe covered his face with his fatnes, and hathe collopes in [his] flanke.—Geneva Bible. Job, xv. 27.

T'involve the lean in cauls, and mend the lard;
Sweet-breads and collops were with skewers prick'd
About the sides; imbibing what they deck'd.
Dryden. Homer. Iliad.

COLLUCTAʹTION. Lat. Colluctatus, past part. of Colluctari, (con, and luctari; of uncertain etymology,) to struggle, to wrestle.

A struggle, a conflict.

Phlegm transforms her [the phansie] into water and fishes; and the shadowy melancholy intangles her in the colluctation with old hags and hobgoblins, and frights her with dead men's faces in the dark.
H. More. Antidote against Atheism, b. ii. c. 9.

Unless peradventure it may seem still easier, if we superadde also, That the being assimilated to these cherubick orders is not without considerable colluctation and conflict, the soul not being able to approach the angelical nature in her inward advances but with pain and agonie.
Id. Appendix to Defence, c. 11.

COLLUʹDE, v. } Fr. Colluder, collusion; It. Collusione; Lat. Colludere; con, and ludere; (ludere, a Ludis, who first introduced them (luds) into Hetruria, whence the Romans received them.)
CoLLUʹDING, n.
CoLLUʹSION.
CoLLUʹSIVE.
CoLLUʹSIVELY.

To play together, to game together; to unite in the same play, game, or trick; and thus, to unite for purposes of fraud or deception.

If fals fickil tunges, suche cloked collusion
Hath brought nobil princes to extreme confusion.
Skelton. The Crowne of Laurel.

Well let vs now leue the cloked collusion, that remayned in Fraunce, and returne to the open dissimulacion, which now appeared in Englande.—Hall. Hen. VI. an. 36.

Colluders yourselves, as violent to this law of God by your unmerciful binding, as the Pharisees by their unbounded loosening.—Milton. Tetrachordon.

Your goodly glosings and time-serving colludings with the state, are but like watermen upon the Thames, looking one way, rowing another way.
Mountagu. Appeale to Cæsar, p. 43.

This notwithstanding, yᵉ reasons, that M. Hardinge hath here founde out, are so sclender & so simple, & so guilefully, & vntruely gathered, that his frendes of yᵗ side may happily suspecte, he had vsed some collusion to betraie their cause.
Jewell. Replie to M. Hardinge, p. 602.

For if they would simplie and heartelie search for the truth, they would not vse these craftie collusions and deceitful lugglings.—Fox. Martyrs, p. 1071.

This would authorize marriage in both parties after divorce for adulterie, which is a matter not fully resolved on among diuines, and may breed collusive divorces or willfull breache of wedlock, to the intent to marye elsewhere.
Strype. Life of Bp. Whitgift. Records, b. iii. No. 17.

A second character is, that they [miracles] be done publickly in the face of the world, that there may be no room to suspect artifice and collusion.—Atterbury, vol. iii. Ser. 11.

If they let things take their course, they will be represented as colluding with sedition, or at least tacitly encouraging it. If they remonstrate against persecution, they propagate rebellion.—Burke. Let. on the Affairs of Ireland.

But the gentlemen on the other side of the house know as well as I do, and they dare not contradict me, that the nabob of Arcot and his creditors are not adversaries, but collusive parties, and that the whole transaction is under a false colour and false names.—Id. Nabob of Arcot's Debts.

If this had been permitted, the land might have been alienated collusively without the consent of the superior.
Blackstone.

COLLUSTRAʹTION. Lat. Collustrare, to enlighten together. (See ILLUSTRATE.) The quotation explains the word.

Neither yet [is the moon illuminated] by a certain collustration, and mutual conjunction of lights as torches which being set a burning together, do augment the light.
Holland. Plutarch, p. 953.

COLLUʹTION. Lat. Colluere; con, and luere, lutum, to wash.

A wash; or, as it is now called, a Lotion.

If the teeth be ill affected, a collution made with goat's milke, or bull's gall is thought to be a remedie of great efficacie.—Holland. Plinie, b. xxviii. c. 12.

COʹLLY, n. } On Midsummer's Night's Dream,
CoʹLLY, v. } Act i. sc. 1, "Brief as the lightning in the collied night," Mr. Steevens remarks: "Collied, i. e. black, smutted with coal; a word still used in the Midland counties." So in B. Jonson's Poetaster, "Thou hast not collied thy face enough." (Shakespeare, v. 184.) See COLLOP.

To blacken, to darken, to obscure.

Oth. Now by heaven,
My blood begins my safer guides to rule,
And passion (having my best judgment collied)
Assays to leade the way.—Shakes. Othello, Act ii. sc. 3.

Suppose thou saw her in a base beggar's weed, or else dressed in some old hirsute attires out of fashion, fowle linnen, course raiment besmeared with soot, colly, &c.
Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 554.

COʹLLYBIST. Gr. Κολλυβος, genus nummi, παρα το κολλασθαι βουν, quod æri illi quasi agglutinatus esset bos, id est, imago bovis incusa:—

A species of small brazen coin, used for change, upon which the image of an ox was impressed, (Hesychius. See also Martinius.) And hence applied to the exchange of money, (Vossius.)

Κολλυβιστης,—a money changer; one who changes money of greater value into that of less, (Parkhurst.)

See now how his eyes sparkle with holy anger, and dart forth beams of indignation, in the faces of these guilty collybists; see how his hands deale strokes and ruin!
Bp. Hall. Cont. Christ's Procession to the Temple.

COʹLOCYNTH. Gr. Κολυνθις; Fr. Colocynthe, coloquinthe. See the quotation from Pliny.

There is another wild gourd called colocynthus but that is full within and lesse than that of the garden.
Holland. Plinie, b. xx. c. 3.

The bigots of the Roman Church have but too manifestly declared to all the world, that if they were rerum potiti, masters of our affairs, they would suffer nothing to grow but their own colocynths or gourds.
Bp. Taylor. Dis. from Popery, Introd.

COʹLONEL, } Also anciently written Coronel.
CoʹLONELSHIP. } (qv.) Fr. Colonel; It. Colonello; Sp. Coronel; Dut. Kolonel, koronel; Mid. Lat. Coronellus. So called, says Minshew, because he is exercitus columna, the pillar of the army. Junius derives from columella, a name given to certain domestic servants; because on them, veluti in columellas, the weight of domestic management was reposed. A colonel is—

The commanding officer of a regiment.

Captain or colonel, or knight in arms
Whose chance on these defenceless doors may seise,
If deed of honour did thee ever please,
Guard them, and him within protect from harms.
Milton, son. 8.

Spite of his lordship, and his colonelship,
Or the judge's favour, I will make him render
A bloody and a strict accompt.
Massinger. A New Way to Pay Old Debts, Act iii. sc. 2.

When he forsook the peaceful dwelling,
And out he went a colonelling,
Strange hopes and fears possest the nation,
How he could manage that vocation,
Until he show'd it to a wonder,
How nobly he could fight and plunder.—Hudibras. Elegy.

He now supports, by scores, and dozens,
His very honourable cousins,
And entertains, with wine and cards,
Half the gay colonels of the guards
Cawthorn. The Temple of Hymen.

CO'LONY. Co'loner, n. Colo'nial. Colo'nical. Co'lonize, v. Co'lonist: Colonization. Co'lonizing, n. } Fr. Colonie; It. and Sp. Colonia; Lat. Colonus. So called a colendo, because—The persons of which it (sc. the colony) consisted removed from one country and settled in another, for the purpose of cultivating the latter.

At our first cõming to anker on this shore we saw a great smoke rise in the Isle Raonoak neere the place where I left our colony in the yeere 1587, which smoke put us in good hope that some of the colony were there expecting my return out of England.—Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. iii. p. 291.

They that would thus colonize the stars with inhabitants, do place in the body of the sun, as was said before, the purest, the most immaterial, and refined intellectual creatures, whence the Almighty calls those he will have to be immediately about his persons, and to be admitted to the hierarchy of angels.—Howell, b. iii. s. 1. Let. 9.

For there was never an hand drawn, that did double the rest of the habitable world, before this; for so a man may truly term it, if he shall put to account, as well that that is, as that which may be hereafter, by the farther occupation and colonizing of those countries, [America]—Bacon. Holy War.

When they had registered and placed the coloners, they remained still themselves in the same colonie, which they had as witness of their innocence, and just dealings.
Holland. Livius, p. 147.

Colonical services were those which were done by the Ceorls and Socmen, (that is husbandmen) to their lords [the King and Thanes] of all sorts, for some portions also of their outlands.—Spelman. On Feuds & Tenures, c. 25.

As when some great and gracious monarch dies,
Soft whispers first, and, mournful murmurs rise
Among the sad attendants; then the sound
Soon gathers voice, and spreads the news around,
Through town and country, till the dreadful blast
Is blown to distant colonies at last.—Dryden. Eleonora.

Can ye lead out to distant colonies,
Th' outflowings of a people of your wrong'd
Brethren, by impious persecution driven,
And arm their breasts with fortitude to try
New regions. Dyer. The Fleece, b. iii.

This furnished an opportunity for examining into the value of the French constitution, either considered as applicable to colonial government or in its own nature.
Burke. Appeal from the New to the Old Whigs.

From the free, I come now to the barbarians in bonds. By these I mean the vast multitudes stolen yearly from the opposite continent, and sacrificed by the colonists to their great idol, the God of Gain.
Warburton. Works, vol. x. Ser. 20.

Our ministers are of opinion that the increase of our trade and manufactures, that our growth by colonization, by conquest, have concurred to accumulate immense wealth in the hands of some individuals.—Burke. The Present Discontents.

If the dominions of Spain in the New World had been of such moderate extent, as bore a due proportion to the present state, the progress of her colonizing might have been attended with the same benefit as that of other nations.
Robertson. America, vol. iv. b. viii.

COLONNADE. It. Colonnata, colonna; Fr. Colonne; Lat. Columna. See Column.
A range of columns.

The sun shines, broken, through yon arch that rears
This once-round fabric, half deprived by years,
Which rose a stately colonnade, and crown'd
Encircling pillars now unfaithful found;
In fragments, these the fall of those forbode,
Which, nodding, just un-heave their crumbling load.
Savage. The Wanderer, c. 4.

COLOSS, n. Colo'ssus. Colo'ssal. Colo'ssean. Colo'ssick. } Fr. Colosse; It. and Sp. Colosso; Lat. Colossus; Gr. Κολοσσος; ad verbum sonat frangeoculum, (says Vossius,) παρα το κολουειν τα οσσα; because, on account of its immense height, oculorum aciem frustraretur. See Martinius and Vossius.
A statue of great height and size.

But the coloss of the sun, which stood at Rhodes, and was wrought by Chares of Lyndes, apprentice to the above-named Lysippus, was above all others most admirable; for it carried seventie cubits in height: well, as mightie an image as it was, it stood not on end above threescore years and six; for in an earthquake that then happened it was overthrowne: but lying as it doth along, a wonderfull and prodigious thing it is to view and behold.
Holland. Plinie, b. xxxiv. c. 7.

Who, rapt with wonder of their famous praise
Admire their statues, their colossues great;
Their rich triumphal arcks which they did raise,
Their huge pyramids, which do heaven threat.
Spenser. On Scandenberg, son. 3.

——— Men merely great
Think they bear all the kingdom's worth before them;
Yet differ not from those colossick statues,
Which, with heroick forms without o'erspread,
Within are nought but mortar, flint, and lead.
Chapman. Trag. of Byron D'Ambois.

K. Henry. ——— First Ireland,

Co'lourishing, n. } Fr. Couleur; It. Colore; Sp. Colór; Dut. Koleur; Lat. Color. Of uncertain etymology. Vossius suggests the Gr. Χροννυειν, colorare, by metathesis, and the change of n into l. Scheidius thinks from κολαω, (quod idem ac κειλω, vel κελλω, tundendo percutio,) and that color is—percussio, species oculos percellens.
To colour was used early in our language, (met.)—
To give a fair or specious appearance, (sc.) for purposes of deception, of delusion; to remove unpleasing, offensive appearances; to render pleasing and agreeable, worthy of favour or approbation.

Amongst curiosities, I shall place colouration, though it be somewhat better: for beauty in flowers is their prominence.—Bacon. Natural History, s. 606.

For had the tunicles and humours of the eye, all or any of them been colorate, many of the rays proceeding from the visible object would have been stopt and suffocated before they could come to the bottom of the eye, where the formal organ of vision is situate.—Ray. On the Creation, pt. ii.

Would truth dispense, we could be content, with Plato, that knowledge were but remembrance, that intellectual acquisition were but reminiscential evocation, and new impressions but the colouring of old stamps which stood pale in the soul before.—Brown. Vulg. Err. To the Reader.

In this composition of white, the several rays do not suffer any change in their colorifick qualities by acting upon one another; but are only mixed, and by a mixture of their colours produce white.—Newton. Optics.

That then God should visit him [man] by sending his son into the world that the world through him might be saved, this is so far above our imaginations as well as deserts, that it seems to be the most colourable pretence for infidelity, that it is too great a thing for mankind to believe.
Stillingfleet, vol. iv. Ser. 9.

The queen was not yet of age; and in her minority, they pretended that the government of the kingdom belonged to the states: and therefore they gathered together many of her mal-administrations, for which they might the more colourably put her out of the government.

COLT, v. / COLT, n. / CO'LTISH. / CO'LTISHLY. There seems to consider the A. S. and Eng. Colt, the Sw. Kult, and Eng. Child, A. S. Cild, i. e. any thing borne or begotten, to be the same word differently written and applied. See CHILD.

The young male of the horse is called a colt; and it is, consequentially, applied to—

That which has the frolicksomeness, wantonness, wildness, or other distinguishing quality of that animal.

"From Decker's Bellman's Night Walks, &c. 1616, it appears (Mr. Steevens says) that the technical term for any innkeeper or hackney-man who had been cheated of horses, was a colt." Hence to colt, is—

To befool, to trick.

Chaucer. The Marchantes Tale, v. 10,015.

COLUMN, n. / COLU'MNAR. / COLU'MNARY. / CO'LUMNED. Fr. Colonne; It. Colonna; Sp. Columna; Lat. Columna, so called because they are supports (culmina) to the top or roof, (Festus.) And culmina, so called because the ancients covered their buildings with straw or thatch, (culmo.) See the example from Wotton.

It is also applied to any thing which stands as columns do;—firmly, regularly, side by side, as the columns of a page, a column of troops.

Pillars which we may likewise call columnes, for the word among artificers is almost naturalized, I could distinguish into simple and compounded.—Wotton. Elem. of Architect.

Then having learned the Hebrew tongue, and procured a copy of the Hebrew code, he added two more columns; in one, the Hebrew text and letters, in the other, the same text, in Grecke letters. and this he called hexapla.
Grew. Cosmo. Sacra, b. iv. c. 1.

Which is in some way not beyond the contrivance of art, in submersions and inlava, inverting the extremes of the plant, and fetching the root from the top, and also imitated in handsome columnary work in the inversion of the extremes.—Brown. Cyrus' Garden, c. 3.

O'er this a vocal organ mounted high
On marble columns, strikes the wond'ring eye,
And feeds at once two senses with delight,
Sweet to the ear, and splendid to the sight.
Hughes. The Triumph of Peace.

Here columns heap'd on prostrate columns torn
From their firm base, increase the mould ring mass,
Far as the sight can pierce, appear the spoils
Of sunk magnificence.—Warton. Pleas. of Melancholy.

His floating robe around him folding,
Slow sweeps he through the column'd aisle;
With dread behold, with gloom beholding
The rites that sanctify the pile.—Lord Byron. Giaour.

CO'LURES, n. Lat. Coluri; Gr. Κολουροι, curtailed. Circles drawn through the poles, cutting the equinoctial into equal parts, the zodiack into unequal; called Κολουροι, (Vossius,) as if κολοι την ουραν, caudâ mutili; because part of them is invisible to us, and of such part they seem to be (mutili) deprived or destitute.

——— Thence full of anguish driven
The space of seven continu'd nights he rode
With darkness, thrice the equinoctial line
He circl'd, four times cross'd the car of night
From pole to pole, traversing each colure.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. ix.

Correct old time alludes to that great man's Grecian Chronology, which he reformed on those two sublime conceptions, the difference between the reigns of kings, and the generations of men, and the positions of the colures of the equinox and solstices, at the time of the Argonautic expedition.—Warburton. Commentary on the Essay on Man.

CO'MART, n. Is the reading of the quarto, 1604. The folio (as quoted below) cou'nant, which has been rejected by the editors, because it "makes a tautology;" though comart is confessedly a word not found elsewhere. It is probably merely a misprint of the folio.

——— Which had return'd
To the inheritance of Fortenbras,
Had he bin vanquisher, as by the same cou'nant
And carriage of the article design'd,
His fell to Hamlet. Shakespeare. Hamlet, Act i. sc. 1.

CO-MATE, n. Co, and mate, (qv.); which Skinner derives from the A. S. Metan, to meet; invenire, occurrere; because like is easily associated with like.

Duc. Sen. Now my co-mates, and brothers in exile,
Hath not old custome made this life more sweete,
Then that of painted pompe.
Shakespeare. As You Like It, Act ii. sc. 1.

CO'MATE. Hairy. Lat. Coma, the hair; perhaps from the Gr. Κοσμειν, to ornament, to adorn. The example has been already quoted under CAUDATE, (q v.)

COMB, v. / COMB, n. / CO'MBER. / CO'MBING, n. / CO'MBLESS. A. S. Camb, pecten; Dut. Kammen, kemmen; Ger. Kammen, pectinare; Dut. and Dan. Kam; Ger. Kamm, pecten. Junius thinks that camb (crista avium) is so called, a καμπη, flexus, curvatura; and that comb, for the hair, is so used from its likeness, dentatæ serratæque cristæ gallinaceæ. Wachter, that the ancient Ger. Kam, manus, (whence ham, and then hand,) was the primitive word, and has remained to us,—applied to things, which have incisions (incisuras) similar to the hand, pectini, cristæ, &c.

To comb (or kemb) is to draw a comb through the hair or wool, so as to separate, and disentangle it.

Up riseth Damian the nexte morwe,
Al passed was his sicknesse and his sorwe.
He kembeth him, he prouneth hem & piketh,
He doth al that his lady lust and liketh.
Chaucer. The Marchantes Tale, v. 9885

She had bathe, she had reste,
And was arrayed to the beste.
But with no craft of combes brode
Thei might hir hore lockes shode.—Gower. Con. A. b. i.

Yet he kembyng his olde white heares, one of the teeth of the combe entered into his hed, wherby grew an impostume, by occasion wherof, he ended his honorable life for so small a case.—Golden Boke, Let. 4.

They would bryng our men earthen pottes of the quantitie of two gallons, full of hony and hony combes for 100 shilles.—Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 129.

So after that repentaunce hath cast down our combe, and hath well shaken our disease, whã baptisme hath scoured or pourged vs and made vs emptie and voyde from al synnes, there bee suche thinges ministred, and geuen to vs as maye holsomlye replenish the soule agayne beeyng now well clensede and made voyde.—Udal. Luke, Pref.

For Livia tooke closely an egge from under an hen that was sitting, and kept it warme sometime in her owne, otherwhiles in her woman's hands by turns one after another, so long, untill there was hatched a cock chicken with a notable combe upon the head.—Holland. Suetonius, p. 95.

But now in her owne fountaine bathes her faire
And shapefull, now kembs her golden haire.
Sandys. Ovid. Met. b. iv.

But oft would bathe her in the crystal tide,
Oft with a comb her dewy locks divide. Ensden. Ib.

And Clemens Alexandrinus is as severe against old men that with black lead combes put a lie upon their heads, and so disgrace their old age, which ought to be relied upon, believ'd and reverenced for truth
Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. iii. c. 2.

And fair Ligea's golden comb,
Wherewith she sits on diamond rocks
Sleeking her soft alluring locks. Milton. Comus.

Combers of wooll, made use hereof [spermaceti] and country people for cuts, aches and hard tumours.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iii. c. 24.

The baldness, thinness, and (as both men and women think) the deformity of the hair is usually supplied by borders and combings; also by whole perukes, like artificial sculls, fitted to their head.
Bp. Taylor. Artificial Handsomeness, p. 44.

Kate. What is your crest, a coxcombe?
Pet. A comblesse cocke, so Kate will be my hen.
Shakespeare. Taming a Shrew, Act ii. sc. 1.

From their o'erflowing combs you'll often press
Pure luscious sweets, that, mingling in the glass,
Correct the harshness of the racy juice,
And a rich flavour thro' the wine diffuse.
Addison. Virgil, Geor 4.

Demaratus informed him, that it was a custom among the Spartans to comb down and adjust their hair, when they were determined to fight till the last extremity.
Glover. Leonidas, Preface.

Behold the fleece beneath the spiky comb
Drop its long locks, or from the mingling card,
Spread in soft flakes and swell the whiten'd floor.
Dyer. The Fleece, b. iii.

If any wool peculiar to our Isle
Is given by nature 'tis the combers lock,
The soft, the snow-white and the long-grown flake.
Id. Ib. b. ii.

COMB. Fr. Combe; A. S. Comb; a valley enclosed on either side with hills, (Somner.)

And then to Ina call'd: O if the roomes,
The walks and arbours in their fruitful coombes,
Have famous been through all the westerne plaines,
In being guiltlesse of the lasting staines
Pour'd on by lust and murther: keepe them free!
Browne. Britannia's Pastorals, b. ii

No small delight the shepheards take to see
A coombe so dight in Flora's livery,
Where faire Feronia honour'd in the woods,
And all the deities that haunt the floods,
With powerful nature strove to frame a plot,
Whose like the sweet Arcadia yielded not.
Browne. Britannia's Pastorals, b. ii. s. 2.

CO'MBAT, v. Co'MBAT, n. Co'MBATANT, n. Co'MBATANT, adj. Co'MBATER. COMBA'TERIE. Co'MBACY. Fr. Combat, combattre; It. Combattere; from con, and batuere, (says Skinner,) to fight, to strike; and batuere, from A. S. Batte, fustis, (Spelman.) Of this, the A. S. Beat-an, to beat, supplies the root. See BATTLE.

To fight, to battle; to be or cause to be in fight or battle; to engage in battle, to strive, to struggle with or against, to contend, or contest, to conflict.

There came an holy man, termed Haucoir-Hamsho, a kinseman to one of the sophies, who mounted the sayd hill, and combating with the sayd giant, did binde not onely him in chaines but also his woman called Lamis ache, with his son named After.—Hackluyt. Voyages, vol i. p. 347

Then darts we gan to sling
In wide and weightless skies,
And then the fiercest fight of all
and combat did arise.
Turbervile. The Lover to Cupid for Mercie.

Strype. Records, No. 11. Pace to the Emperor.

——— What had I
To oppose against such powerful arguments?
Only my love of thee held long debate:
And combated in silence all these reasons
With hard contest.—Milton. Samson Agonistes.

(O sacred Muse) my hauty thoughts inspire
And make a trumpet of my slender quill
To thunder out this furious combat shrill.
Fairefax. Godfrey of Bovlogne, b. vi. s. 39.

And valient Essex this bold challenge sent,
As combatant in his great soueraigne's name,
To know, who durst of noble borne descent,
Stand forth amongst the rest to fight for fame.
Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 846.

It may be too, I' the ordinance of nature,
Their valours are not yet so combatant,
Or truly antagonistick, as to fight.
B. Jonson. The Magnetick Lady, Act iii. sc. 8.

And the Sicambri (which are now the people of Geldria) seem rightly in their owne German language to have been Sighcampers, that is, combattors or fighters for victory, for that sigh, in the ancient Teutonicke, is victory, and a camper, a combater.—Vestegan. Restitution, &c. p. 14.

This sayd, the kinge did marke and make
A pront of the same,
And did conclude by combacy
To winne or loose the game.
Warner. Albion's England, b. iv. c. 22.

Or if combattensie not please,
The land is rich and large,
And they copernicers may live,
And vs of death discharge.—Id. Ib.

God himself (as I may so speak) undertook the quarrell and fought his battles, and that brought him [Paul] off not only safe, but triumphant, which surely was as much more honourable than to have the combat ended by parting the combatants, as it is for a generous and brave enemy to have his quarrel decided by the verdict of a victorious sword, than took up and compromised by the mean expedients of reference and arbitration.—South, vol. vi. Ser. 8.

Plato, combating the atheistical objections about the origin of evil, employs this argument in defence of Providence; "That amongst an infinite number of possible worlds in God's idea, this which he hath created, and brought into being, and admits of a mixture of evil is the best."
Warburton. Pope. Essay on Man.

The tide of nature returning strongly on both, the father in his turn embraced his son, and bathed him with his tears; whilst the combatants on either side, astonished at so unusual a spectacle, suspended the fight, applauded this striking act of filial piety and paternal tenderness, and pressed that it might become the prelude of a lasting peace.
Burke. An Abridg. of Eng. Hist. an. 1083.

But and if these humane lawes loke to destroye the Crysten lybertie, to combre mes consciences and to oppresse the glory of Cryste.—Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, c. 6.

For if thou were not brought sometime into combraunce whence God onely could deliuer thee, thou shouldst neuer see thy fayth.—Tyndall. Workes, p. 117.

But this, after he was admytted, was so proude & so combrous, yᵗ he rulyd all by wyll & nothyng by ryght or goodlye ordre of reason or conscience.—Fabyan. Caroli VI. an. 14.

Wherefore they were afrayed lest his Innocēt blode wold be auenged and required at their handis, & therfore to be defended, they (as now do all siche lyke combrouse consienced clerkis and bushopes) be setting vp of these their baners and images of the emprours and kinges contend and stewe to gette their fauour, but all was in vayne.
Joye. Exposicion of Daniel c. 9.

Which Arthegal perceuing, strooke no more,
But losing soone his shield, did it forego,
And whiles he combred was therewith so sore,
He gan at him let drive more fiercely then afore.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. v. c. 12.

Howbeit some seeking out the troth more eagerly, did cumber sore and trouble the Patricians, accusing them, that they abused the common people with vain and fond perswasions, whilst themselves in the mean time had murdered the king with their own hands.—North. Plutarch, p. 29.

I pray then let me only by this bearer know it, that I may provide you some fit lodgings at a good distance from Whitehall, for the preservation of blessed liberty, and avoidance of the cumber of kindness; which in troth (as we have privately discoursed) is no small one.—Reliq. Wotton. p. 429.

For if my lord of Suffolk should remove from the king's privacy to a place of much distraction and cumber, without leaving a friend in his room, he might peradventure take cold at his back.—Id. p. 437.

A cumber world yet in the world am left,
A fruitless plot with brambles overgrown:
Of all those joys that pleas'd my youth bereft,
And now too late my folly but bemoan.—Drayton, Ecl. 2.

There is no facilitie or wealth in this mortall world so perfite, which is not darkened with some cloude of combrance and aduersitie.—Grafton. Hen. II. an. 33.

The working about the frames called Vines, and the raising of mounts (considering other urgent occasions) was most laborious, painfull and combersome.
Holland. Ammianus, p. 245.

The worde of God is a two-edged sword: as for the weapons of naturall reason, they are as the armour of Saul, rather cumbersome about the souldier of Christ then needfull.
Hooker. Ecclesiasticall Politie, b. iii. s. 8.

And yet by the knowledge of the double progression, beginning from the unit as 1, 2, 4, 8, a great deal of cumber, and sometimes of charge may be saved.
Boyle. Works, vol. iii. p. 428.

Whereas humane art acts upon the matter from without cumbersomely and molimmously, with tumult and hurlyburly; Nature acting upon it more commandingly, doth its work easily, cleaverly, and silently.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, p. 179.

This it is to soar above the rest of mankind; and this representation I lay before you, that I may be informed how to divest myself of the laurels which are so cumbersome to the wearer, and descend to the enjoyment of that quiet, from which I find a writer of the first class so fatally debarred.—Rambler, No. 17.

I am afraid that whether married or unmarried, we shall find the vesture of terrestrial existence more heavy and cumbrous, the longer it is worn.—Id. No. 45.

COMBI'NE, v. COMBI'NABLE. CO'MBINATE, adj. COMBINA'TION. Fr. Combiner; It. Combinare; Sp. Combinar; Lat. Combinare, barbarum pro jungere, connectere, (Vossius, de Vitiis, iv. 4.) "Bina jumenta jungere," (See Martin.) "Combinage," Cotgrave says, "is a coupling, uniting, or joining of pairs."

To combine, then, was to join, unite, connect, or fasten two together, as we now use the word to couple. It is now applied, generally,—

To join, to connect, to counite, to coalesce.

Adew myne owne dere spouse my worthy lorde
The faithful lone, that dyd vs both combyne,
In mariage and peasable concorde,
Into your handes here I cleane resyne.
To be bestowed vpon your children and myne.
Sir T. More. A ruful Lamentation.

Burnet. Own Time, an. 1707.

COMBU'STIBLE, adj. COMBU'STIBLE, n. COMBUSTIBI'LITY. COMBU'STION. COMBU'ST. Et uro et buro dixere, says Vossius. Buro, he derives from the Gr. Πυρ, and uro, from the Hebrew. A combustible is—

Any thing that may be burnt; generally applied to things easily ignited or set on fire; and which also spread their fire so as to communicate it rapidly to other materials.

Combustion—to the heat, noise, and confusion of a fire or conflagration; (met.) to the heat, noise, and confusion of violent passions.

And if I had, O Venus ful of mirth,
Aspects badde of Mars or of Saturne
Or thou combust. Chaucer, Troilus, b. iii.

Faith hath alwai good hope & charitie with it, and cannot but worke well, no more than the fire can be wt out heate and light and burne al combustible thinges that it may touch and tary with.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 264.

Guianerius had a patient could make Latin verses when the moon was combust, otherwise illiterate.
Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 192.

It [love] shall be cause of war, and dire events,
And set dissention 'twixt the son and sire;
Subject and servile to all discontents,
As dry combustious matter is to fire.
Shakespeare. Venus & Adonis.

All those other smaller fires, which are lodg'd in several parts of the lower regions joyning themselves with this mighty flame, shall prey upon whatever is combustible, and so rage first within the bowels of the earth, beginning the tragick execution upon those damned spirits that are there confined.—Glanvill. Pre-existence of Souls, c. 14.

Yellow amber, jet, and the like; all which are all of a bituminous unctuous nature; as appears by their easie combustibility and smell when they are burned.
Digby. Of Bodies, c. 19.

For noble descriptions there are hereof in the Grecian funerall of Homer. In the formal obsequies of Patroclus, and Achilles; and somewhat elder in the Theban war, and solemn combustion of Menoeceus, and Archemorus, contemporary unto Jair the eighth judge of Israel.
Brown. Urne Burial, c. 1.

They burnt not children before their teeth appeared, as apprehending their bodies too tender a morsell for fire, and that their gristly bones would scarce leave separable relicks after the pyral combustion.—Id. Ib. c. 4.

There [were] great combustions and divisions among the heads of the university in preparation to the commencement.
Mede. Life, p. 34.

It is here just as if any combustible matter, which is set on fire; if we take the flame presently, it is soon extinguished; but give it a little scope, and it proves often beyond your power to quench it, till it hath done mischief.
Sharp, vol. v. Disc. 5.

What may we conceive the inward disturbance is, where the outward shew (which usually dissembles the inward passion,) betrayed so much rage and disorder; for when such flames break out, what combustion may we conceive within.—Stillingfleet, vol. i. Ser. 10.

The suddenness, horror, and universality of their destruction are set forth by the similitude of a "fire" consuming the dry trees in a "forest," or some combustible matter on the "mountains."—Horne. On the Psalms, Ps. 83.

First through the shoulders, or whatever part
Was seiz'd the first, a fervid vapour sprung.
With rash combustion thence, the quivering spark
Shot to the heart, and kindled all within;
And soon the surface caught the spreading fires.

COME, v. } A. S. Coman; Dut. Komen; Ger. Kommen; Sw. Komma.
COME, n. }
CO'MER. }
CO'MING, n. }
CO'MMING, n. }

Come is a complex term, expressing a particular species of motion. We see a thing in motion; the distance lessens, the thing approaches, and it comes: if the distance increases, the thing departs, and it goes. Such is the broad distinction between to come and to go.

To come is usually interpreted in conjunction with prepositions, and even with other words connected with it; but the signification of the expression is entirely consequential, and must be deduced from the context. He came to me; he came to the block: in these instances came means literally the same; the consequences to the moving body were different, and are by usage implied.

And (met.) The reckoning came to a pound; i.e. amounted. He came to his senses; i.e. he regained or recovered them. In these expressions, amount, and regain, are by usage denoted.

To come off,—to escape, to evade, to elude.

Comelyng in R. G. and Wiclif,—comers (sc.) from foreign places; foreigners, strangers.

For ther nys in thi kyndam so wys mon ywys,

Holinshed. Description of England, b. ii. c. 6.

And this I dare confidently averre, that there are no such enemies to the king's prerogative as those who, advancing it beyond due bounds, do necessarily draw it into dispute, in which it commonly comes off with losse and diminution in the end, as in the late cases of loanes, ship-money, and the like.—Prynne. The Soveraigne Power, pt. i. p. 103.

But suppose David himself suborned Joab to do what he did, that he might have a fair come off, and manifest his love to his son. If David had done so; why God himself did so.—Goodwin. Works, vol. i. pt. ii. p. 135

Among the causes which he pleaded before his quæstorship, was that of the famous comedian Roscius, whom a singular merit in his art had recommended to the familiarity and friendship of the greatest men in Rome.
Middleton. Life of Cicero, s. i.

Whenever Aristotle speaks of comedy, we must remember that he speaks of the old, or middle comedy, which was no other than what we should call farce, and to which his definition of comedy was adapted: μιμησις φαυλοτερων; that is, as he explains himself, "an imitation of ridiculous characters."—Twining. Aristotle. Poetics, vol. i. Note 28.

For it [the metre] can plainly be no other than a careless and looser Iambic, such as our language naturally runs into, even in conversation, and of which we are not without examples, in our old and best writers for the comic stage.

"To comfort, solace, recreate; to encourage or cheer up; also to confirm, help, strengthen, reinforce." To comfort is—

To strengthen, to invigorate, (sc. the spirits;) to encourage, to inspirit, to animate, to enliven; to cheer, to console.

Comfortable is used very variously:—That may be comforted (As you like it;) capable of comfort, or of being comforted; feeling, receiving or taking comfort: also, that can or may comfort; able to comfort; giving or bestowing comfort, cheering or cheerful.

Drayton. England's Heroical Epistles.

Be sure they will, said th' Angel; but from heav'n
He to his own a comforter will send,
The promise of the Father, who shall dwell
His spirit within them, and the law of faith
Working through love, upon their hearts shall write,
To guide them in all truth.—Milton. Par. Lost, b. xii.

Ay dooing things, that to his fame redownd,
Defending ladies cause, and orphans right,
Whereon he heares, that any doth confownd
Them comfortlesse through tyranny or might;
So is his soveraine honour raisde to heucns hight.

B. Jonson. The Fox, Act iii. sc. 7.

Now all the remedy that is to be had in such an exigence as this, is to have the next preacher sent for, who must instil a little comfortable divinity into him, to make him sleep, and so his soul departs the Lord knows whither.
Chillingworth, Ser. 6.

Which [talents] if he do but carefully manage, and improve to the uses they were given for, he will for ever preserve to himself the love, and favour, and kindness of his heavenly Father, and shall not fail both of living happily and comfortably here, and arriving also to a glorious state of immortality hereafter.—Sharp, vol. vi. Ser. 3.

Thou only comforter of minds oppresst,
The port where wearied spirits are at rest;
Conductor of Elysium, take my life,
My breast I offer to thy sacred knife.
Buckinghamshire. The Temple of Death.

Such is the condition of our life here! Either, not to have our most passionate wishes granted us; which is present unhappiness, or if we have them granted, to find, by a comfortless experiment, that we have sought misery instead of happiness and embrace a vain shadow, where we expected a substantial good.—Hoadley, vol. iii. Ser. 15.

Consolation, or comfort are words which, in their proper acceptation, signify some alleviation to that pain to which it is not in our power to afford the proper and adequate remedy; they imply rather an augmentation of the power of bearing, than a diminution of the burthen. To that grief which arises from a great loss, he only brings the true remedy who makes his friend's condition the same as before; but he may be properly termed a comforter, who by persuasion extenuates the pain of poverty, and shows in the style of Hesiod, that half is more than the whole.
Rambler, No. 32.

Strype. Records, No. 10. Dr. Crome's Declaration.

Though his valour might perhaps have given a just pretension to one of the first charges in an army, it could not certainly be a sufficient ground for a title to the command of three nations.—Cowley. Government of Oliver Cromwell.

How commandatory the apostolical authority was, is best discernible by the Apostle's mandates unto the churches upon several occasions, as to the Thessalonians,—We command the brethren.—Bp. Morton. Episcopacy Asserted, p. 73.

"Ah! yet," said he, "yet, stubborn king! repent,
Whilst thus unarmed I stand.
Ere the keen sword of God fill my commanded hand;
Suffer but yet thyself, and thine to live."
Cowley. The Plagues of Egypt.

If it were true, which is here said by the distribist, that the leviticalness or ceremoniality of the offerings seems to lie here, viz. in the uncommandedness or freedom to offer or not to offer,—then sure the leviticalness, &c. would not extend to the commandedness of the other offerings, and consequently the commanded offerings under the law would not be levitical: which is palpably false.
Hammond. Works, vol. ii. p. 195.

Seeing then that God alone is Lord of the soul and spirit, he alone can bind them by commandment; seeing God alone can take notice of the sins of the heart, and is onely able to inflict the punishment, namely, everlasting death and damnation, the proper punishment which the conscience feareth he alone may command upon pain of eternal damnation.
Mede. Works, b. i. Dis. 34.

Who sees an army all in rank advance,
But deems a wise commander is in place
Which leadeth on that brave victorious dance.
Davies. On Dancing.

Which is not easily performed by man; it requireth not only a broad foot, but a pliable flexure of joints and commandible disposure of all parts of progression.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iii. c. 1.

Every spectator must learn of him, as it is his profession, he sets up school for it, his practices are so commandingly exemplary, that they do even force and ravish the most maidenly tender conscience.
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 506.

For the performing of these workes, he had given commandement that all prisoners whersoever should be transported into Italie: and that no person attaint and convict of ante wicked act, should be condemned otherwise, but to worke thereat.—Holland. Suetonius, p. 194.

Thou great commandress, that dost move
Thy sceptre o'er the crown of love,
And through his empire, with the awe
Of thy chaste beams, dost give the law.
Carew. A New Year's Gift to the Queen.

The goddess we adore Dea Moneta, Queen money, to whom we daily sacrifice, which steers our hearts, hands, affections, all: the most powerful goddesse, by whom we are reared, depressed, elevated, esteemed, the sole commandresse of our actions.
Burton. Anat. of Melan. To the Reader, p. 37.

Whereas humane art acts upon the matter from without cumbersomely and molimmously, with tumult and hurliburly, nature acting on it from without more commandingly, doth its work easily, cleaverly, and silently.
Cudworth. Intel. System, p. 179.

Where there is a sincere and honest endeavour to please God and keep his commandments, although persons fail in the manner of doing it, God will accept of such as righteous.
Stillingfleet, vol. iv. ser. 3.

O! sovereign of the willing soul,
Parent of sweet and solemn-breathing airs,
Enchanting shell! the sullen cares,
And frantic passions, hear thy soft control:
On Thracia's hills the Lord of war
Has curb'd the fury of his car,
And dropp'd his thirsty lance at thy command.
Gray. The Progress of Poesy.

In his profession, Sir Sidney Smith might be considered as a distinguished person, if any person could well be distinguished in a service in which scarce a commander can be named without putting you in mind of some action of intrepidity, skill, and vigilance, that has given them a fair title to contend with any man in any age.
Burke. On a Regicide Peace, Let. 3.

Lat. Con, and memor, from Memini, preterperf. of the obsolete meneo, or meno, and meno, the Gr. Μενειν, manere, to stay or remain. See MEMORABLE.

To stay, or cause to stay, to keep or preserve, (sc.) in the mind; to manifest, show or declare that we keep or preserve in the mind; by some public act—to solemnize or celebrate any thing preserved in the mind.

The lambe or feaste is called the Lorde's passeouer; and yet was neither the lambe nor the feaste his passyng ouer, but the sign and commemoration of his passyng by.
Tyndall. Works, p. 169.

All these testimonies have been expres for our purpose, That the thankagivinge and prayers of the church in the Christian sacrifice were offered unto the Divine majestie through Christ commemorated in the symbols of bread and wine, as by a medium whereby we find acceptance.
Mede. Works, b. ii. c. 6.

After whose death [Metrodorus] making in one of his letters a kind commemoration of the happiness which they two had enjoyed together, he adds at last, that he thought it no disparagement to those great felicities of their life that, in the midst of the most talked-of and talking country in the world, they had lived so long, not only without fame, but almost without being heard of.—Cowley. Ess. Obscurity.

That rest which God superadded, being only commemorative of their deliverance from the Egyptian servitude, was not moral, not perpetual.—Bp. Taylor. Rule of Con. b. ii. c. 2.

The breaking and eating of the bread is a communication of the body of Christ, a sacrifice commemoratiue of Christ's offering up his body for us, and making us partakers, or communicating to us the benefits of that bread of life, strengthening, and giving us grace.
Hammond. Works, vol. i. p. 129.

The sixth and last thing to be proved was, That Christ is offered in this sacrifice commemoratively only, and not otherwise.—Mede. Works, b. ii. c. 9.

The succeeding paschal sacrifices, though commemoratory of the first, yet varied something from it.
Hooper. On Lent, p. 271.

We are called upon to commemorate a revolution, as surprising in its manner, as happy in its consequences, as full every way of wonder, and of all the marks of a Divine contrivance, as any age or country can shew.
Atterbury, vol. i. Ser. 7.

So that this sacrament was designed to be a standing commemoration of the death and passion of our Lord till he should come to judgment; and consequently the obligation that lies upon Christians to the observation of it is perpetual, and shall never cease to the end of the world.
Tillotson, vol. i. Ser. 25.

All legal sacrifices being only types of his, and therefore to have an end, and expire together with him, our Lord was pleased to institute this, not for a propitiatory sacrifice, as the Papists absurdly imagine, but as a commemorative sacrifice, to put his church always in mind of that which he then offered, by that one oblation of himself for the sins of mankind.—Beveridge, vol. i. Ser. 34.

You will pardon me, I hope, for speaking in this advantageous manner of my own conduct; but as you advise me to allevaate my present uneasiness by a retrospect of my past actions, I will confess, that, in thus commemorating them, I find great consolation.—Melmoth. Cicero, b. ii. Let. 5.

The commonwealth which acts uniformly upon those principles; and which after abolishing every festival of religion, chooses the most flagrant act of murderous regicide treason for a feast of eternal commemoration, and which forces all her people to observe it—This I call regicide by establishment.—*Burke. Yet can we not thus commensurate the sphere of Trismegistus, or sum up the unsuccessive and stable duration of God.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. vii. c. 3.

O let us be sure then, our confidence, our claims to heaven, improve not above their proportion, that we preserve this symmetry of the parts of grace, that our hope be but commensurate to our sincerity, our daringness to our duty.
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 554.

For the law of sin and the law of the mind, that is, grace in us, and sin in us, are adequately and commensurately opposite, and contrary in every soul in which grace is wrought.—Goodwin. Works, vol. ii. pt. iv. p. 277.

A strait and a curve line may perhaps be brought by immediate commensuration, nearer to equality than any given difference; but the equality can never be brought to a point.
Grew. Cosmo. Sacra, b. i. c. 3.

Though God is not bettered by any thing we can give or do, all our services being to him as nothing; yet he is pleased to esteem them by their commensuration to us, if in respect of our abilities they are the best.
Wilkins. On the Gift of Prayer, c. 2.

Their poems were made at first with intention to have them sung, as well epic as dramatic, (which custom hath been long time laid aside, but began to be revived in part of late years in Italy) and could not be made commensurable to the voice or instruments in prose.
Hobbs. On Davenant's Preface.

To make the commensurableness yet nearer as in the matter of promulgation, the people of all other churches, have but a promulgation at second hand by hearsay; and have no interest of presence at all; so answerably let these elders of other churches, have but the like share in that power, and the controversie is at an end.
Goodwin. Works, vol. iv. pt. iv. p. 127.

We can, I think, have no positive idea of any space or duration which is not made up, and commensurate to repeated numbers of feet or yards, or days, and years, which are the common measures, whereof we have the ideas in our minds, and whereby we judge of the greatness of these sort of quantities.—Locke. Hum. Underst. b. i. c. 17.

It confounds the greatest subtilties of speculation, with the riddles of God's omnipresence; that can spread a single individual substance through all spaces, and yet without any commensuration of parts to any, or circumscription within any, though totally in every one.—South, vol i. Ser. 1.

If such a supply should be productive, in a degree commensurate to its object, it must also be productive of much vexation, and much oppression.—Burke. Rey. Peace, Let. 3.

He [Sir Andrew] is acquainted with commerce in all its parts, and will tell you that it is a stupid and barbarous way to extend dominion by arms, for true power is to be got by arts and industry.—Spectator, No. 2.

It seems highly probable, that all finite created spirits have, and must have material vehicles of purity and fineness in proportion to their natural and moral powers conjunctly not only to limit and direct their energy and efficiency, but to commensurate with other animals and inanimat created natures.—Cheyne. On Regimen, Disc. I.

The greatness of a state, and the happiness of its subjects, how dependent soever they may be supposed in some respects, are commonly allowed to be inseparable with regard to commerce; and as private men receive greater security, in the possession of their trade and riches from the power of the public, so the public becomes powerful in proportion to the opulence and extensive commerce of private men.
Hume. Ess. Of Commerce.

To view these animals in a commercial light, we must add, that the English were late before they engaged in the whale fishery: it appears by a set of queries, proposed by an honest merchant in the year 1575, in order to get information in the business, that we were at that time totally ignorant of it.—Pennant. British Zoology. The Common Whale.

Every man thus lives by exchanging, or becomes in some measure a merchant, and the society itself grows to be what is properly a commercial society.
A. Smith. Wealth of Nations, b. i. c. 4.

If you think that this participation was a loss, commercially considered, but that it has been compensated by the share which Scotland has taken in defraying the publick charge—I believe you have not very carefully looked at the publick accounts.—Burke. Two Letters to Gentlemen at Bristol.

Fr. and Sp. Commination; Lat. Minor, minatus.

To threaten.

A denunciation of future ill; a threatening of punishment or vengeance. The Commination in the Book of Common Prayer, is entitled, "A Commination, or denouncing of God's anger and judgment against Sinners."

He will not faile to make fall vpon them the terrible commination and threate that the spirit speaketh of in the Apocalyps vnto the byshope of Ephesy. I wil come and remoue thy candlestycke oute of hys place.
Sir T. More. Workes, p. 827.

They which were not resident should giue the one half of their goods, and that for the space of three yeers together: with terrible comminations to all them that did resist.
Fox. Martyrs, p. 264. The Pope's Precept, an. 1216.

Ouer and besides diuers other threatnings and comminatory wordes by you pronounced and vttered vnseemly, and by far vnmeet to proceede out of the mouth of you that are in such roome & place as ye be in.
Id. Ib. p. 1265. Bonner's Recusation against Sir T. Smith

Jeroboham well saw that the throne and the altar must stand, or fall together, that a son of David could not have such power over the altar without an utter subversion of the government, of the succession; therefore is he thus galled with this comminatory prediction.
Bp. Hall. Cont. Jeroboham.

The French king might perceive after what good manner and fashion the king's grace had in a letter exhorted the emperor, allecting him first by doulce and pleasant introductions, adding afterwards matter sounding perfectly to sharpness and commination, to descend to the king's desire.
Strype. Memoirs. Hen. VIII. an. 1526.

COMMI'NGLE. Lat. Com, and mingle, from A. S. Mæng-an, mengan—

To mix, to blend, together.

——— And blest are those,
Whose blood and judgment are so well co-mingled,
That they are not a pipe for fortune's finger,
To sound what stop she please.
Shakespeare. Hamlet, Act iii. sc. 2.

COMMI'NUTE, v.
COMMINU'TION.
COMMI'NUTIBLE.
COMMI'NUATE, v.

Fr. Comminuer; Lat. Comminuere, comminutum, to lessen. "Verbum fuit antiquum μίω, unde μινύω, μινυθω: Lat. Minuo, minuor, minutus," (Scheidius.) As now applied, it seems to signify—

To break or destroy the continuity; to separate into small parts; to crush or grind with the teeth or mandibles.

The more solid food which needs greater manducation, cannot be sufficiently comminuated for chyle, or ground low enough for the stomach, until these teeth have done this work upon it.—Smith. Portraiture of Old Age, p. 104.

So that there are three causes of fixation; the even spreading both of the spirits and tangible parts; the closenesse of the tangible parts; and the jejunenesse, or extream commination of spirits.—Bacon. Natural History, s. 799.

By which account, a diamond steeped in goat's blood, rather increaseth in hardness, than acquireth any softness by the infusion; for the best we have are comminuble without it.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. ii. c. 5.

We see likewise, that fusion makes metals fluid, and in fusion there is manifestly a comminution of the melted body.
Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 38.

So that this smiting of the steel with the flint doth only make a comminution, and a very rapid whirling and melting of some particles: but that idea of flame is wholly in us.
Bentley, Ser. 2.

Those that form this genus [gilt head,] as well as the following, feed chiefly on shell fish, which they comminute with their teeth before they swallow them.
Pennant. British Zoology. The Gilt Head.

The superior quantity of shell-fish, which may more frequently call for the use of its comminuting powers than those of our trouts, might occasion this difference.
Id. Ib. River Trout Salmon

COMMI'SERATE, v.
COMMISERA'TION.
COMMISERA'TIVELY.
COMMI'SERABLE.
COMMI'SERATOR.

Lat. Con, and miser. See MISERY.

To feel pain for, or on account of, the pain felt by others; to sympathize or compassionate.

Certainly we seem not to remember what a gentle and commiserating judge God is, or that ourselves are men, and have to deal with humane frailty, and man's miserable condition, which we ought to behold with pity, and not handle with bitterness.—Mede. Works, b. i. Disc. 37.

If any one do pity our offence,
Let him be sure that he be far from hence:
Here is no place for any one that shall
So much as once commiserate our fall.
Drayton. Dudley, to Lady Jane Grey.

In Kent, Ethelbert or Pren, by some meane having usurp'd regal power, after two year's reign contending with Kenulph the Mercian, was by him taken prisoner and soon after out of pious commiseration let go.
Milton. History of England, b. iv.

It is the sinfullest thing in the world to forsake or destitute a plantation once in forwardness, for besides the dishonour, it is guiltiness of blood of many commiserable persons.
Bacon. Ess. Of Plantations (of Colonies.)

This was the end not onely of this noble and commiserable person Edward the Earle of Warwicke, e'dest sonne of the Duke of Clarence, but likewise of the line male of the Plantagenets.—Id. Hen. VII. p. 195.

He hath divided his soul from the case of his soul, whose weakness he assists no otherwise than commiseratively, not that it is his, but that it is.—Overbury. Characters.

Deaf unto the thunder of the laws, and rocks unto the cries of charitable commiserators.—Brown. Christ. Morals.

There is one kind of virtue which is inborn in the nobility, and indeed in most of the antient families of this nation; they are not apt to insult on the misfortunes of their countrymen. But you, sir, I may tell it you without flattery, have grafted on this natural commiseration, and raised it to a nobler virtue.—Dryden. Dedication to Amphitryon.

Where neither the parent reason, nor her stern progeny, the laws, will commiserate discordancy of temper, or distress of circumstances; but with relentless rigour, combine to fasten that fatal yoke, which those victims of their cruel policy must submit to wear, till as merciless a deliverer sets them free.—Warburton. Works, Ser. 22.

Who can peruse the relation of the last moments of Epaminondas, at the battle of Mantinea, without finding himself touched with a pleasing commiseration?
Melmoth. Cicero, b. i. Let. 20.

COMMI'SSURE, n. Fr. Commissure; Lat. Commissura, junctura, et compages eorum, quæ committuntur, (Gesner.)

Fr. Commissure,—"a commissure or seam in a bone, (as in the skull;) also any neer, closing, joyning, or couching of things together," (Cotgr.)

Yet in the setting on of some flowers, and seeds in their sockets, and the lineall commissure of the pulp of severall seeds may be observed some shadow of the harmony.
Brown. Cyrus' Garden, c. 3.

Which [armadillo] is covered on its back and sides with a strong scaly crust or shell, or a hard or bony substance, jointed like armour, or the scales of the tail of a lobster, by four transverse commissures in the middle of the body, connected by tough membranes.—Ray On the Creation, pt. ii.

And then for the greater security, the whole pipe, especially at the commissures, was diligently cased over with our close black cement, upon which plaster of Paris was strewed to keep it from sticking to their hands or cloths that should manage the pipe.—Boyle. Works, vol. iii. p. 205.

COMMI'T, v. COMMI'TTER. COMMI'TTERSHIP. COMMI'TTER. COMMI'TTIBLE. COMMI'TMENT. COMMI'TTED. CO'MMISSARY. CO'MMISSARYSHIP. COMMI'SSION, v. COMMI'SSION, s. COMMI'SSIONARY. COMMI'SSIONATE, v. COMMI'SSIONER.

It. Commettere; Sp. Cometer; Fr. Commetre; Lat. Con, and mittere, i. e. facere ut eat; to cause to go, to send. Mitto, Vossius thinks, is from μεθίω, seu μεθίημι, mitto, missum facio, dimitto. Committere, (Festus) is properly insimul mittere, aut conjungere; though now used both for facere and incipere.

To cause to go, to put, place, or remove into the hands, or under the care or custody, of another; to deliver, consign, or intrust to another. Also to put or place in opposition; and simply, to do, as to commit a crime.

Commissary,—One to whom any thing is committed.

So also committee,—One to whom, a number of persons to whom, any person or thing is committed.

Commission,—To commit, deliver, consign, or entrust; to appoint or empower.

Now, sire, then shuln ye committe the keping of your persone to your trewe frendes, that ben approved and yknowe, and of hem shuln ye axen helpe, youre persone for to kepe.
Chaucer. Tale of Melibeus.

Discrete he [the Serjeant] was, and of gret reverence:
He semed swiche, his wordes were so wise,
Justice he was ful often in assise,
By patent, and by pleine commissioun.
Id. Prologue, v. 317.

And thereto the emperour named his companyons, the tyme, place, and order of all the conspiracy, and also to whom the sword was committed.—Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. ii. c. 7.

But peraduenture thou that knowest Christ wilt say, (as many doe) that Christes death and redemtiõ serueth thee but for original sinne, or at most for those sinnes that thou committedst before baptisme.—Frith. Works, p. 16.

Howbeit, the singuler great loue and affection that he bare unto the said Eastrilde could not yet out of his minde & be forgotten, wherefore he made a caue vnder ground in the city of Troynouaunt and enclosed her therein, committing her vnto the custody of his most neere and familyer friends.
Grafton. Chronicle. First Age, pt. iv.

The committers of which sinne he burnt at a stake among the Turkes, as Moses also commaundeth in hys lawe.
Tyndall. Works, p. 267.

Then the sayd knight counsailed with other barons and knyghtis, and so reported theyr opinyons, and whiche was, how they had well deserued deth for dyuers horryble dedis, the which they had commyted.
Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. i. c. 12.

After most hartie commendations, I [John Masone] haue sent to my lords at this present the emperor's commissaries answere made at the dietl, to a letter lately sent from the French king to the said dietl, of the circulls of Germanie assembled at Francfort.—Burnet. Rec. pt. ii. b. v. No. 32.

At whose hands, after long attendance giuen he was discharged, and so returned home againe, being also dismissed of his commissarishp.—Fox. Martyrs, p. 1117. an. 1544.

For the ful confirmation and strengthening of all the sayde premisses, the three foresayd honourable and religious personages being by the said right reuered lord the master general appointed as commissioners to deale in the above written ordination and composition, haue caused their seals vnto these presents to be put.—Hacklugt. Voy. vol. i. p. 152.

Let gastly shadows his lewd eyes affright;
And the dire thought of his committed evil
Shape every bush a hideous shapeless devil.
Shakespeare. Rape of Lucrece.

All things committed to thy trust conceal,
Nor what's forbid by any means reveal.—Denham. Justice.

Mr. Pym being speaker of the committee of the commons that were appointed to prosecute, gave in the articles of impeachment.—Baker. Charles I. an. 1640.

Gregorie the seuenth, Pope, excommunicated all committers of simonie, and remooued marryed priestes from executing diuine seruice, whereof rose great troubles in England.
Stow. William the Conqueror, an. 1075.

Wherein indeed Bodine hath attempted a particular enumeration, but (besides the mistakes committible in the solary compute of years) the difference of chronologie disturbs the satisfaction and quiet of his computes.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iv. c. 12.

The lords were discontented at the commitment of the Earl of Arundel, about his son's marriage with the Duchess of Lennox his sister.—Whitelock. Memoirs, an. 1626.

In this world's warfare they, whom rugged fate,
(God's commissary) doth so thoroughly hate,
As in th' court's squadron to marshal their state.
If they stand arm'd with silly honesty,
With wishing, prayers, and neat integrity,
Like Indians gainst Spanish hosts they be.
Donne. To Sir H. Wotton.

As who would make a steersman to a barge
Of one blind born, who can no danger see,
If that ship drown, forsooth I say for me,
Who gave the steersman such commission,
Should of the ship make restitution.—P. Fletcher, Ecl. 4.

Neither is this onely by way of bare verbal declaration (which might proceed from any other lips,) but in the way of an operative and effectual application, by virtue of that delegate, or commissionary authority, which is by Christ entrusted with them.—Bp. Hall. Cases of Conscience, c. 9.

For it is well known that God revealed his will in those days by prophets particularly called, and commissionated to that purpose.—Hammond. Works, vol. iii. p. 8.

Not long after these arrived a messenger from the French king with letters to the nobility, desiring t[he] * the marriage should be consummated betwixt the young Queen and the Dauphin his son, and that certain commissioners should be sent to assist the solemnity.
Spotiswood. Church of Scotland, b. ii. an. 1558.

He himself prayed for them that crucified him; some of which were, without doubt, those very Pharisees, whom he had before charged with committing the sin against the Holy Ghost, in the twelfth chapter of Matthew.
Sharp, vol. iii. Ser. 16.

In this sense, therefore, it may be, and is probably true, that charity shall cover many sins, even of the first magnitude; i. e. it shall prevent the temporal inflictions due to them, and often even after pardon obtained, pursuing the committers of them.—Atterbury, vol. i. Ser. 9.

Concerning which, I shall premise this in general, That there is no sin committable by man, as to the kind of it, but by circumstances is capable of being made a sin of presumption.—South, vol. vii. Ser. 11.

He [Sir A. Cooper] persisting obstinately silent was bid to withdraw, and those, who had depended upon his discovery, being defeated, and consequently very much displeas'd, mov'd warmly for his commitment; of which he, waiting in the lobby, having notice, unmov'd expected his doom.
Locke. Memoirs of the Earl of Shaftsbury.

But the house of commons, made an address to the queen, in which they thanked her for the peace she had concluded, and for the foundation laid for settling our commerce; and prayed her to name commissaries to regulate and finish that matter.—Burnet. Own Time, an. 1713.

We are to deny the supposition, that he [Moses] was a private person at that time, [of killing the Egyptian] but that he was even then commissioned by God governor of Israel, and consequently in the right of a governor, might revenge the wrong done to his subjects.—South, vol. v. S. 8.

But still there is a great difference between pursuing the things of the spirit, with the reluctancy of the flesh, and pursuing the things of the flesh, with the reluctancy of the spirit, the former shows only the motions of the flesh, which being subdued are but infirmities; but the latter do not cease to be wilful sins, tho' there be inward struggling in the commission of them.—Stillingfleet, vol. iv. Ser. 11.

As if he should have said, I have now all power over all things in the world conferred upon me; by virtue whereof I command, empower, and commissionate you to enlarge, settle, and govern the church that I have founded.
Bp. Beveridge, vol. i. Ser. 1.

If upon this enquiry it manifestly appears, that either, no such crime was committed, or that the suspicion entertained of the prisoner was wholly groundless, in such cases only it was lawful totally to discharge him. Otherwise he must either be committed to prison, or give bail: that is, put in security for his appearance, to answer the charge against him.—Blackstone. Commentary, b. iv. c. 22.

In this dubious interval between the commitment and trial, a prisoner ought to be used with the utmost humanity; and neither be loaded with needless fetters, or subjected to other hardships than such as are absolutely requisite for the purpose of confinement only.—Id. Ib.

The Lord Chancellor, upon petition or information, grants a commission to enquire into the party's state of mind; and if he be found non compos, he usually commits the care of his person, with a suitable allowance for his maintenance, to some friend who is then called his committee.
Id. Ib. b. i. c. 8.

Being asked, Whether he was ever in the Murawar country? he said, yes, he was commissary to the army in that expedition.—Burke. App. to Sp. on Nabob of Arcot's Debts.

From him, [Jesus Christ] and those commissioned by him, we learn what the wisest men, and even angels had desired to look into, and could at most discern but imperfectly through the types and shadows of the patriarchal and Mosaic dispensations.—Hurd. Works, Ser. 30.

Yet this uncandid Junius would insinuate, that the dignity of the commander in chief is depraved into the base office of a commission-broker; that is, Lord Granby bargains for the sale of commissions.—Junius, Let. 2.

COMMI'X, v. COMMI'XION. COMMI'XTION. COMMI'XTURE.

Lat. Com, and mix; A. S. Misc-an, misc-ere, to mix, or mingle; omitting the termination an, we have misc; and this by a common transposition became mics, i. e. mix, (Tooke, ii. 298.) Vossius derives misc-ere from the Heb.; Tooke from the above A. S. Misc-an.

To co-mingle; or to mingle or blend together.

His lot is next to rise, and next in world his head shall reare,
Of Troyan and Italian blood commixt, thy worthy ehilde
Thy Silulus, borne after thy decease in forest-wylde.
Phaer. Virgill, Eneidos, b. vi.

This stock that of Ausonian blood commixt shall shortly rise
In vertue men shall passe, and passe the goddes that dwell in skies.
Id. Ib. b. xii.

Howbeit, the emperour abydeth styll in his Cryuell lawe and all is by reason of commyction of this maryage
Berners. Froissart, Cronycle, vol. ii. c. 40.

Or, self conceited, play the humourous Platonist,
Which boldly dares affirm, that spirits themselves supply
With bodies, to commix with frail mortalitie.
Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 3.

Yet with his admirable streame, doth not his waues commix,
But glides aloft on it like oyle.—Chapman. Hom. Il. b. ii.

Were thy commixion, Greeke and Troian so
That thou could'st say, this hand is Grecian all,
And this is Troian; by Joue multipotent,
Thou should'st not beare from me a Greekish member
Wherein my sword had not impressure made
Of our ranke feud.—Shakes. Troil. & Cress. Act iv. sc. 5.

In him that shape, in her there was that sweetness,
Might make him lik'd, or hir to be belov'd;
As this commixtion, so their married mind
Their good corrected, or their ill relievd,
As truly loving, as discreetly kind,
Mutually joy'd, as mutually griev'd.
Drayton. Moses, his Birth and Miracles, b. i.

For though some species there be of middle and participating natures, that is, of bird and beast, as bats and some few others yet are their parts so conformed and set together, that we cannot define the beginning of or end of either; there being a commixtion of both in the whole, rather than an adaptation or cement of the one unto the other.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iii. c. 11.

I am modestly confident my humble language shall be accepted, because I shall present all readers with a commixture of truth, and Sir Henry Wotton's merits.

Walton. Life of Sir Henry Wotton.

Indeed, as the flocks of Jacob were distanced "three days journeys from those of Laban," so (to prevent voluntary or casuall commixtures) our styles are set more than a month's journey asunder.—Fuller. Worthies, Ches-shire.

Nor do they much help the matter, who say, that those frogs that appear sometimes in great multitudes after a shower, are not indeed engendered in the clouds, but coagulated from a certain sort of dust commixed and fermented with rain-water.—Ray. On the Creation, pt. ii.

If it be not a good yellow, but pale, (which usually happens for want of an exact commixtion of the ingredients) it may be returned to the residue, mingled better with it again, and sublimed once more.—Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 136.

This spirit I therefore ascribe to the salt of the husks altered by their commixture with the copper.

Id. Ib. vol. i. p. 582.

From ocean's verge, if not too far remov'd,
Its shelly sands convey a warm compost,
From land and wave commixt, with richness fraught.

Dodsley. Agriculture, c. 2.

But in the Jewish republic, where the church and state were incorporated, this commixture made no other confusion than what arises from the mistakes of men, ignorant of the nature of that sacred economy.

Warburton. The Divine Legation, b. ix. Note.

COMMO'DIOUS. COMMO'DIOUSLY. COMMO'DIOUSNESS. COMMO'DITY. COMMO'DE, n. } Fr. Commode; It. Comodo; Sp. Cómodo; Lat. Commodus; (Gr. Συμμετρος,) whence (Vossius) the adverbs commodum, as if cum modo, with measure, with moderation; and whatever is so, is commodious, and useful. Modus, he derives, from the Heb., and considers the meaning to be,—to mete, or measure, metiri, mensurare.

Commensurate or proportioned to, fitting, suiting, (sc.) a particular use or purpose; convenient, serviceable, useful, beneficial.

But yet men delityngе in vertue moughte with cardes and tables deuyse games, wherein mought be moch solace and also study commodiousе, as deuising a bataile, or contentiō betwene vertue and vice, or other like pleasant and honest inuention.—Sir T. Elyot. Governour, p. 92.

Thus hath thy loue been vnto me
As pleasant and commodious,
As was the fire made on the sea
By Naulus hate so odious,
Therwith to trayne the Grekish host
From Troyes return, where they were lost.

And who buys sorrow cheapest, takes
An ill commodity too dear. Cotton. Melancholy.

A marshy ground commodiously was near,
Thither she ran, and held her breath for fear,
Lest if a word she spoke of any thing,
That word might be the secret of the king.

Dryden. Wife of Bath's Tale.

If a traveller being in some ill-inhabited eastern country, should come to a large and fair building, such as one of the most stately of those they call caravanzeras though he would esteem and be delighted with the magnificence of the structure, and the commodiousness of the apartments, yet, supposing it to have been erected but for the honour or the pleasure of the founder, he would commend so stately a fabric, without thanking him for it.

Boyle. Works, vol. v. p. 419.

The commode is described to have been a kind of head dress, worn by the ladies at the beginning of the XVIIIth century, which by means of wire bore up the hair and forepart of the cap, consisting of folds of fine lace, to a great height.—Spectator, No. 98. Notes, oct.

A famous monk, Thomas Connecte by name, attacked it with great zeal and resolution. This holy man travelled from place to place to preach down this monstrous commode; and succeeded so well in it, that as the Magicians sacrificed their books to the flames upon the preaching of an apostle, many of the women threw down their head dresses in the middle of his sermon, and made a bonfire of them within sight of the pulpit.—Id. Ib.

It [Old Aberdeen] has the appearance of a town in decay, having been situated, in times when commerce was yet unstudied, with very little attention to the commodiousness of the harbour.—Johnson. Journey to the Western Isles.

Now, to a people, thus circumstanced, unfurnished, in a good degree, with arts and manufactures, and but slenderly provided with the means of exchange for the commodities they produce; management, thrift, and what we call good husbandry, must have been a capital virtue.

Hurd. Works, Ser. 1.

COMMODORE. Perhaps from the Sp. Comendador, a commander.

We haue heard before how, the duke of Yorke, as heire to Lionell duke of Clarence, pretended priuily, a tytle to the croune, and howe his friendes commoned secretly, with diuerse persons of that matter, and excited them to set forwarde, and auaunce that parte to the vttermoste.

Hall. Hen. VI. an. 20.

For thoughe wee commoned of sorowe and heauinesse, yet was the thynge that wee chiefly thoughte vpon, not the trybulacion itselfe, but the cumforte that may growe thereon.

Sir T. More. Workes, p. 1169.

And when al this was concluded, then the kyng's counsayle comoned amongе themselfe for a maryage for theyr kynge, for it was tyme.

Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. ii. c. 51.

Wherefore leste in repeting a thing so frequent and commune, my boke shulde be as fastidious or fulsome to the readers, as suche marchaunt preachers be nowe to their customers, I wylle reuerently take my leaue of diuines.

Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. i. c. 21.

And I say agayne, that as the priestes doe nowe vse to consecrate it, it helpeth not the poore comens of a rishe.

Frith. Works, p. 153.

Then gan I thus resolue: more pleasant is the lyef
Of fayethefull frends, that spend their goods in commone without stryef
For as the tender frend appeaseth euery gryef;
So yf he falle that lieuee alone, who shall be his relyef.

Surrey. Ecclesiastes, c. 4.

I wolde therefore declare also this your vertewe vnto the students, exhorting them to loue &d reuerēce godly princes, and in their praiers commende them with their comens vnto God.—Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, Ep. Ded.

In the countrey, at a sessions, or other assembly, if no gentyll men be there at, the sayinge is, that there was none but the communalitye, which proueth, in myne opinion, that plebs in Latine, is in Englishe comunalitie; and plebeii be communers.—Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. i. c. 1.

But whatsoeuer semblant the prouost, and they of Paris made to the kyng of Nauer, for all that, the lorde Philippe of Nauer wolde neuer trust the, nor wold nat come to Paris, for he alwayes sayd, that in a comynaltie ther was neuer no certentie, but finally, shame, rebuke, and dyshonour.

Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. i. c. 181.

For he was so much esteemed, both of the nobility & commonalty, for his liberality, clemency, integrity, and courage that above all others, he was extolled & praised to the very heauen.—Grafton. Hen. VI. an. 39.

Also the vi. Arfacidauell the inuincible king of Parthes, not onely was depriued, but also banished out of his realme, because he dined at a knighte's brydale, and would not eate at the bridale of a communer.—Golden Boke, c. 17.

But sir, since Chrysostom saith, that priests are the stomack of the people, it is needfull in preaching, and also in commoning, to be the most busie about the priesthood.

Foxe. Martyrs. Examination of W. Thorpe, p. 495.

All that wynter the kynge lay styll at the siege, and thought and ymagined euer to kepe ye commentie of Flaunders in frendshyppe, for he thought by their meanes the soner to cōe to his entent.

Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. i. c. 111.

But ye ende of theyr debate and question, & of the effect of theyr victorye, was to enterpryse all cruell thynges, the one againste the other, by violence or by forme of justice, and wyth punishmente, not hauinge regarde to the comonweale nor to that, which justice required.

Nicolls. Thucydides, fol. 91.

Euen so the preachers of the truth which rebuke sinne are not the troublers of realmes and commonwealths, but they that do wickedly, and namely high prelates and mighty princes, which walk without the feare of God and liue abhominably corrupting the common people with their example.—Tyndall. Works, p. 341.

Wherevpon ambassadours were sent vppon both parties, and dyuers meanes of intreatie were commoned of, but in the ende, it came all to none effect.

And commons went alike to wracke,
Nor God nor man he feares.
Warner. Albion's England, b. v. c. 28.

Much good land might be gained from forests and chases more remote from the king's access, and from other commonable places, so as always there be a due care taken, that the poor commoners have no injury by such improvement.
Bacon. Advice to Sir G. Villiers.

In this hospitall which they builded, was to be relieved, a gentleman three dayes, bread, wine, and waxe, a commoner eight dayes and nights, meate, drinke and lodging.
Stow. Hen. IV. an. 1407.

When they [the Gauls] saw the commoners' houses fast shut and locked to, and contrariwise the stately palaces of noblemen and cheefe senators standing wide open, they were at a stand, and doubted more in a manner to enter upon the open places, than the shut.—Holland. Livie, p. 306.

It may be he went yesterday to a wedding, merry and brisk, and there he felt his sentence, that he must return home and die, (for men very commonly enter into the snare singing, and consider not whither their fate leads them.)
Bp. Taylor. Holy Dying, c. 4. s. 1.

Com. He is a lawyer, and must speak for his fee,
Against his father, and mother, all his kindred;
His brothers, or his sisters, no exception
Lies at the common-law.
B. Jonson. The Magnetick Lady, Act ii. sc. 3.

A second collection which appertains to a ready provision, or preparatory store, is that which Cicero intimates, where he gives it in precept, that we have common-places in ready preparation argued and handled pro and contra.
Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, b. vi. c. 3.

Some say the senses receive the species of things, and deliver them to the common-sense; and the common-sense delivers them over to the fancy, and the fancy to the memory, and the memory to the judgment, like handling of things from one to another, with many words, making nothing understood.—Hobbs. Of Man, pt. i. c. 2.

The latter is that which we call the law of common-wealth, the very soule of a politique body, the parts whereof are by law animated, held together, and set on worke in such actions as the common good requireth.
Hooker. Ecclesiasticall Politie, b. i. § 10.

The commonwealth, yet panting, underneath
The stripes, and wounds of a late civill warre,
Gasping for life, and scarce restor'd to hope;
To seeke t' oppresse her, with new cruelties,
And utterly extinguish her long name,
With so prodigious, and unheard of fiercenesse.
B. Jonson. Catiline, Act iii.

The commonness, and the general or long reception of a doctrine, is not a sufficient argument of the truth of it.
South. Ser. vol. vii. p. 132.

If I would put any thing in my common-place-book, I find out a head to which I may refer it. Each head ought to be some important and essential word to the matter in hand, and in that word regard is to be had to the first letter and the vowel that follows it; for upon these two letters depend all the use of the index.
Locke. A new Method of a Common-place-book.

At the bottom of the title of which is thus written by Dr. Burges. This is one of the very first books of Common-prayer in the beginning of Edward VI. which book, at the request of Archb. Cranmer was reviewed and censured by Martin Bucer, and then reformed accordingly in the 5th of Edward VI. which latter is the book still in force by the statute of 1 Elizabeth, and this [meaning the Common-prayer-book printed 1549] is repealed.
Wood. Athenæ Oxon. (Burges.)

Common appendant is a right belonging to the owners or occupiers of arable land, to put commonable beasts upon the lord's waste, and upon the lands of other persons within the same manor.—Blackstone. Commentaries, b. ii. c. 3.

The deer were suffered to run loose upon their lands, and many oppressions were used with relation to the claim of commonage, which the people had in most of the forests.
Burke. An Abridg. of Eng. Hist. b. iii. c. 8.

The commonalty, like the nobility, are divided into several degrees; and as the lords though different in rank, yet all of them are peers in respect to their nobility, so the commoners, though some are greatly superior to others, yet all are in law peers, in respect to their want of nobility.
Blackstone. Commentaries, b. i. c. 12.

Speculations of this sort, says he, do not bestow genius on those who have it not, they do not perhaps, afford any great assistance to those who have, and most commonly the men of genius are even incapable of being assisted by speculation.
Hurd. On the Provinces of the Drama.

That men should prey on men, when they cannot live without mutual assistance, would be wonderful if the commonness of it did not make it so familiar.
Gilpin, vol. i. Ser. 9.

I say that a little more reflection and a great deal less reading, a little more attention to common-sense, and less blind prejudice for his Greek commentators, would have made Mr. Harris a much better grammarian, if not perhaps a philosopher.—Tooke. Diversions of Purley, vol. i.

COMMO'NITORY. Lat. Commonere, monitum; to call to mind, to call the attention to, to warn. See COMMEMORATE, and MONITORY.

The care of the church of Canturburie, whervnto God hath presentlie appointed vs (albeit vnworthie) you being king, dooth specialie constreine me (in that as yet we are detained in exile) to write vnto your maiestie letters commonitorie, exhortatorie, and of correction.

Enkyndeling hertes, with brandes charitable
The endlesse rewarde of pleasure and solace
To the Father, and the Son, thou art communicable
In vnitate, whiche is inseperable.
Skelton. A Prayer to the Holy Ghost.

If henceforth ye shal finde any that shall presume to communicate with any of them, or else to defend or fauour any such fauorers, receiuers, communicants and defendours, within seauen daies after the same shall appeare and be manifest vnto you, to banish and expell them.
Fox. Martyrs. Rich. II. to the Vice-Chancellor.

And I [Wm. Hastleyn] sayd, if it were duely ministred according to Christe's institution, that then I did beleeue that the faithfull communicants in receiuing that blessed sacrament, did receiue into their inward man, or soule, the very body and bloud of our Sauiour Jesus Christ.—Id. Ib. p. 1935.

For we are not taught of God onely for ourselues, but that euery man after the measure of his faith, should be brotherly communicat with his neighbors, and distribute vnto them that thing he hath learned and knowen in God's schole.
Calaine. Foure Godly Sermons, Ser. 1.

Euen so the marchants and leige people of our soueraigne lord the king and of his kingdomes peaceably frequenting your parts, either in regarde of traffique or of any other iust occasion, may there in like manner friendly bee vsed, and with your marchants and subiects suffered to communicate and to haue intercourse of traffique, enioying the commodities of the ancient league.—*Hackluyt. Camden. Remains. Languages.

For the Father and Spirit do dwell in his human nature, as he is now become one of the persons; the man, God's fellow, in their communicative society together.

Goodwin. Works, vol. i. pt. iii. p. 35.

It is true indeed, God's essential glory cannot be added unto us, but the manifestation of his glory shall arise to us, we shall have it communicatively, as when you see the sun reflect upon the waters, though you see not the sun itself, yet you see as perfect a manifestation of it, as if you should see the sun itself.—Id. Ib. vol. iii. pt. iii. p. 115.

With this account of Peter's they were satisfied, and blessed God, for that communicativeness of his goodness, that he had offered the same mercy to the Gentiles, as to the Jews, that if they will return, and amend, and receive Christ, they shall be saved, and that he had given them the grace to do so.—Hammond. Paraphrase. Acts, xi. 18.

This was that Tetractys which is called Κοσμος or the Universe, by the first communicatour of which mystery both Pythagoras himself and the succeeding Pythagoreans so religiously swore.—H. More. App. to Defence, c. 4.

But such knowledge is too wonderful for us; neither is it communicable to any creature, it being his great prerogative, who can say, wheresoever any thing is, there I am, that I am.

Beveridge, vol. i. Ser. 13.

As the inquisitive, in my opinion, are such meerly from a vacancy in their own imaginations, there is nothing, methinks, so dangerous as to communicate secrets to them; for the same temper of inquiry makes them as impertinently communicative.—Spectator, No. 228.

For, though some kind of communicativeness be essential to his goodness, yet his extension of it without himself, and his vouchsafing it to this or that particular person, are purely arbitrary.—Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 269.

My justice to the communicator who made a great and deserved benefit of the laudanum, made me take that care to conceal some circumstances, that men may easily be much more confident than sure, that they have the right way of making the medicine.—Id. Ib. vol. iv. p. 149.

Siricius, who is our companion and fellow labourer, with whom the whole world by mutual commerce of canonical or communicatory letters agree together with us in one common society.

Barrow. Discourse concerning the Unity of the Church.

That that which we call mass, or missa in Latin, is the communion-office; and it was therefore call'd missa or mass by the ancients, because when that came to be said, all those that did not intend to partake of the sacrament, were dismiss'd the congregation: the deacon told them they were to be gone.—Sharp, vol. vii. Ser. 10.

And thus the communitie perpetually retains a supream power of saving themselves from the attempts and designs of any body, even of their legislator, whenever they shall be so foolish, or so wicked, as to lay and carry on designs against the liberties and properties of the subject.

Locke. Of Civil Government, c. 13.

Impatient reptile, Reason cry'd;

Fr. Commutatif; It. Commutare; Sp. Comutar, commutation; Lat. Commutare, (con, and mutare,) verbum a motu, id est motare, (Vossius,) to move or remove, (sc. the possession.)

To give one thing and receive another for it; to interchange, to exchange, to purchase, redeem, or ransom.

Commutative,—the quotations explain the usage.

Thinking, that the same is not onely good and expedient for example to be followed, and observed of other, but also gretly meritorious towards God wel justifying & mayntening the commutation & alteration of these religious places, wherof only did arise scandalum religionis.

Strype. Records, No. 23. The King's Ambass. to Wolsey.

Justice, all though it be but one entyir vertue, yet is it described in two kinds or spyces, the one is named justyce distrybutyue, whiche is in dystrybution of honour, money, benefite, or other thynge semblable: the other is called commutative or by exchaunge.

Sir T. Elyot. The Governour, b. iii. c. 1.

Vitellescus vows to fast upon the last of February, but changing his mind, believes he may commute his fasting for alms: he resolves to break his fast and to give a ducket to the poor. But when he had new dined, he discourses the question again, and thinks it unlawful to commute, and that he is bound to pay his vow in kind: but the fast is broken, and yet if he refuses upon this new inquest to pay his commutation he is a deceiver of his own soul.

Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. i. c. 4.

There is so free a concession of indulgences appendant to all these, and a thousand fine devices to take away the fear of purgatory, to commute or expiate penances, that in no sect of men do they with more ease and cheapneste reconcile a wicked life with the hopes of heaven then in a Roman communion.—Bp. Taylor. Liberty of Prophesying, s. 19.

Every thing which is used in religion is not matter of precise duty, but there are some things, which indeed are pious and religious, but, dispensable, voluntary and commutable; such are voluntary fasts, &c.

Id. Great Exemplar, pt. iii. Dis. 17.

Justice of actions, is by writers divided into commutative and distributive: and the former they say consisteth in proportion, arithmetical; the latter in proportion, geometrical. Commutative therefore, they place in the equality of value of things contracted for; and distributive, in the distribution of equal benefit to men of equal merit.

Hobbs. Of Man, pt. i. c. 15.

[Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, even so do to them.] This is the measure of commutative justice, or of that justice which supposes exchange of things profitable for things profitable: that as I supply your need, you may supply mine; as I do a benefit to you, I may receive one by you.—Bp. Taylor. Holy Living, c. 3. s. 1.

Be not stoically mistaken in the equality of sins, nor commutatively iniquous in the valuation of transgressions: but weigh them in the scales of heaven, and by the weights of righteous reason.—Brown. Christian Morals.

And thirtie dozen moones with borrowed sheene,
About the world haue times twelue thirties beene,
Since loue our hearts, and Hymen did our hands

And with his head commute for mine.

Fenton. To the Knight of the Sable Shield.

One of the most learned of them, even Aberbinal, saith expressly, that if the high-priest sinned through ignorance against any of God's commandments it was but just that he should be punished with death, and his body burnt; but the law required, that he shall bring a young bullock, instead of himself, and shall lay his hands upon him, to signify that this is his substitute, his commutation, or in his place.

Beveridge, vol. xi. Ser. 69.

According to the common division of justice into commutative and distributive, that which is called commutative is employed only about the strict value of things, according to an arithmetical proportion (as the schools speak) which admits of no degrees.—South, vol. v. Ser. 1.

Thus the sounds, water, and fire, being once annexed to those two elements, it was certainly more natural to call beings participating of the first, watery, and the last fiery, than to commute the terms and call them by the reverse.

Harris. Hermes, b. iii. c. 3.

Rich traders, from their success, are presumed to have sharp and vigorous understandings, and to possess the virtues of diligence, order, constancy, and regularity, and to have cultivated an habitual regard to commutative justice.

COMPA'CT, adj.
CO'MPACT, n.
COMPA'CTEDLY.
COMPA'CTEDNESS.
COMPA'CTNESS.
COMPA'CTURE.

Fr. Compacte, compacture; Lat. Compingere, compactum. Pang-ere, formerly pag-ere; Gr. Πηγειν; Dor. pro Πηγειν, whence πηγνυειν seu πηγνυσθαι, which denotes as well to fix, as to compose, to co-augment, to cause to grow together, (Vossius;) who also observes that the Latins use the expression pangere fœdus, to fix a league or covenant.

To put together, to join, unite, knit, connect, fix or fasten together; to consolidate, to condense.

A compact, (met.) is a confirmed union, league, treaty, or agreement.

Of clouen firre compacted were his ribbs.

Surrey. Virgile Æneis, b. ii.

Their houses wherein they sleepe, they ground vpon a round foundation of wickers artificially wrought and compacted together.—Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 95.

Throughoute all the worlde shulde be founden in no commune weale more noble counsaylours, our lawes not only comprehendynge moste excellent reasons, but also beyng gathered and compacte (as I mought say) of the pure meale or floure, sifted out of the best lawes in all other countreys.—Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. i. c. 14.

In as muche as from hym, the spirite of lyfe floweth into all the whole bodye, beyng compacte and set together of sondrie membres ioyned ordrely one to another, and pearcyng throughe euery ioynt of the limmes.—Udal. Eph. c. 4.

And so always, that such their acts statutes and ordinances bee not contrarie to any compacts, treaties or leagues, by vs or any our progenitours heretofore had or made.

Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 270.

It is a fort impregnable by warre,
Compacted all of mettall shining cleare.

Harrington. Orlando, b. ii. s. 42.

For Christ is the head, whereby the whole bodie being compacted and coupled by euery joynt of gouernment, dothe according to the operation in the measure of euery member increase to a perfect bodie.—Whitgift. Def. p. 469.

Wherevpon writing to Eusebius bishop of Nicomedia in a speciall letter he [Constantinus] willeth him with all diligence to procure fiftie volumes of parchment well bound and compacted.—Fox. Martyrs, p. 94.

Many of them in their own high towring conceits deeme themselves almost Omniscients, and wiser than an hundred parliaments compacted into one.
Prynne. Soveraigne Power of Parliaments, pt. ii. Pref.

Love is a spirit all compact of fire,
Not gross to sink, but light and will aspire.
Shakespeare. Venus & Adonis.

And now in deserts waste and wilde arriued,
Far from the campe, far from resort and sight
Vafrine began, gainst Godfrey's liue contriued,
The false compacts and traines vnfold aright.
Fairefax. Godfrey of Bovlogne, b. xix. s. 86.

Tis an abstract of all volumes,
A pillaster of all columnes
Fancy e're rear'd to wit, to be
The smallest God's epitome,
And so compactedly express
All lovers pleasing wretchedness. Lovelace. Lucasta.

And over it a faire portcullis hong,
Which to the gate directly did meame,
With comly compasse, and compacture strong,
Neither vnseemely short, nor yet exceeding long
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b ii. c. 9.

If the inhabitants are guarded against this eruption, yet they have the uncomfortable knowledge that there is a mass of destruction compacted and pent up for them in the bowels of the earth.—Houdly. Letters signed Britannicus, Let. 20.

The judicious reader may perceive such a reserve (tho' it ly in ambuscade, & is compacted in a narow compass) as may easily rout those troops, which began too soon to cry Victoria.—Wood. Athenæ Oxon. (Bp. Taylor.)

And first, let us weigh gravity against density or sticking together of parts; which sticking or compactedness, being natural to density, requires some excess of gravity in proportion to the density, or some outward violence, to break it.
Digby. On Bodies, c. 4.

The closeness and compactness of the parts resting together, doth much confer to the strength of the union.
Glanvill. Vanity of Dogmatizing, c. 5.

That men should keep their compacts, is certainly a great and undeniable rule in morality: but yet, if a Christian, who has the view of happiness and misery in another life, be ask'd why a man must keep his word, he will give this as a reason, because God, who has the power of eternal life and death, requires it of us.—Locke. Hum. Underst. b. i. c. 3.

In examining whether cold might be diffused through all mediums indefinitely, notwithstanding their compactness, or the closeness of their texture, we must have a care not to make our trial with mediums of too great thickness.
Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 568.

A different spinning every different web
Asks from your glowing fingers; some require
The more compact, and some the looser wreath.
Dyer. The Fleece, b. iii.

This very thing, says Theophylact, gives a stronger proof of the integrity of the evangelists, that they have not agreed in all points: for otherwise, they might have been suspected to have written by compact.
Middleton. On the Variations among the Evangelists.

Nothing so much breaks in upon, and destroys this compactness, as that mode of composition which cuts in the middle the figures on the foreground, though it was frequently the practice of the greatest painters, even of the best age.—Sir J. Reynolds. Art of Painting, N. 27.

COMPA'GES. } Sp. Compage; It. Compage;
COMPA'GINATE. } Lat. Compago, aginis. (See COMPAGINA'TION. } COMPACT.) To compaginate—

To put or set together.

That soul and life that is now fled and gone, from a lifeless carcase, is only a loss to that particular body or compages of matter, which by means thereof is now disanimated; but it is no loss to the whole, it being but transposed in the universe, and lodged somewhere else.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, p. 38.

Thus have I set before you Christian charity in the form of Jacob's ladder, on which our love must ascend to him who rests upon the top of it, and in this similitude mercenary love seemeth to answer well to the lower rounds neerest the earth, on which our infirme nature is allowed to set her first steps, and so to rise by degrees to the uppermost marches which touch heaven, to the which none reacheth but filiall love, and our fraternall charities seeme to be the side pieces which combine and compaginate the whole frame; so that these three concurrences do compleat the meanes of our soules re ascent to her Creator.
Mountague. Devout Essayes, Tr. 14. s. 5.

For this is that which the apostle calls, the body of sin, a compagination of many parts and members; just as among the lawyers, a flock, a people, a legion are called bodies.
Bp. Taylor. On Repentance, c. 5. s. 3.

The latter part of which passage may confirm what we formerly delivered in another section, concerning the unequal compagination of icy islands.

Id. The Shipmannes Tale, v. 12,934.

I will not rehearse here her great chastity & holines of liuing For I speake but of the loue of a good wife: which neuer lightly goeth alone, but euer coupled, & companied with all other vertues.
Vives. Instruction of a Christian Woman, b. ii. c. 4.

For albeit the mā would not take the payne to read the Greeke, yet if he had but once looked vpon the translation of his old friend and companion Erasmus, it would haue taught him to haue sayd, solutus doloribus mortis, that is, dissoluing the paynes of death.—Frith. Workes, p. 42.

As there is an exact companionship of power betweene my father and me; so there is a full consent of will.
Udal. John, c. 10.

Euery societie or companying together is delightful & wished for by nature of al mē, for as much as nature hath ordeined vs to be sociable, friendly, & louing together.
Wilson. The Arte of Rhetorike, p. 56.

Euen so these menne, insteede of Goddes holy majesties, companienge with their owne light, and clowdy fantasses, haue brought foorthe these strange, ougle, deformed shapes in religion, lothesome to remember, and monstreous to behold.
Jewell. A Replie to M. Hardinge, p. 626.

As he thereon stood gazing, he might see
The blessed angels to and fro descend
From highest heauen, in gladsome companee
And with great joy into that citie wend,
As commonly as friend does with his friend.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. i. c. 10.

His eyes full of merry simplicity, his words of hearty companableness: and such an one, whose head one would not think so stayed as to think mischievously.
Sidney. Arcadia, b. ii.

Towards his queene he was nothing uxorious, nor scarce indulgent, but companiable, and respective, and without jealousie.—Bacon. Hen. VII. p. 241.

What a busie life was this of Christ's? He spent the night in the mount of Olives, the day in the Temple; whereas the night is for a retired repose, the day for companie; his retirednesse was for prayer; his companiableness was for preaching.—Bp. Hall. Cont. The Woman taken in Adultrie.

Hee [Richard III.] was close and secret, a deepe dissembler, lowly of countenance, arrogant of heart, outwardly companable where he inwardly hated, not letting to kisse whom he thought to kill.—Stow. Edw. V. an. 1483.

First sweare by thy best love here, in earnest,
(If thou, which lov'st all, canst love any best)
Thou wilt not leave me in the middle street
Though some more spruce companion thou dost meet
Donne, Sat. 1.

And no state that ever yet I read of, but held such unworthy of life, and so not fit for any conversation of men, as having forfeited in that, all which makes one man companionable to another.—Feltham, pt. ii. Res. 18.

Yet he [Sir Joseph Wagstaff] had a great companionableness in his nature, which exceedingly prevailed with those who, in the intermission of fighting, loved to spend their time in jollity and mirth.—Clarendon. Hist. Rebell. b. xiv.

Volum. If it be honor in your warres, to seeme
The same you are not, which for your best ends
You adopt your policy: how is it lesse or worse
That it shall hold companionship in peace
With honour, as in warre.
Shakespeare. Coriolanus, Act iii. sc. 2.

Their love in early infancy began,
And rose as childhood ripen'd into man:
Companions of the war, and lov'd so well,
That when one dy'd, as ancient stories tell,
His fellow to redeem him went to hell.
Dryden. Palamon & Arcite.

Then when at eve, the star of love

For as far as I may conjecture by our master's text, there could no form for such a royal use be comparably imagined like that of the foresaid nation, which I shall adventure to explain.—Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 45.

The half hat, the whole hat, the half smile, the whole smile, the nod, the embrace, the positive parting with a little bow, the comparature at the middle of the room, the superlative at the door.—Cowley. Ess. Of Liberty.

The images of objects are very smal and inconsiderable in our brains comparatively to the vastness of the things which they represent.—Glanvill. Van. of Dogm. pt. ii. c. 3.

And accordingly we see, that we cannot compare black to white, or an horse to an oxe; unless we take together the properties, by which black differs from white, or an oxe from an horse; and consequently they must remain unmingled and without confusion, precisely what in themselves they are, and be indifferent in the sight of the comparer.—Digby. On the Soul, c. i.

There is not in this world, either perfect misery, or perfect happinesse. Comparison, more than reality, makes men happy and can make them wretched.
Feltham, pt. i. Res. 72.

What Theseus did, or Theban Hercules,

Which on the Turks shall greater honour gain,
Than all their giants and their monsters slain
Waller. The Defeat of the Turks, 1685.

But let me have affirm'd our knowledge to be comparatively very little: how, I beseech your lordship, does that any way prove, that this proposition, "knowledge consists in the perception of the agreement or disagreement of our ideas," any way tends to scepticism.
Locke. Second Reply to the Bp. of Worcester.

The comparing them [ideas] one with another, in respect of extent, degrees, time, place, or any other circumstances, is another operation of the mind about its ideas, and is that upon which depends all the large tribe of ideas, comprehended under relation.—Id. Hum. Und. b. ii. c. 11. s. 4.

The first, [Origen] minding his adversary [Celsus] of the difference between the future life promised in the Gospel, and that taught in Paganism, bids him compare the Christian doctrine with what all the sects of philosophy, and all the mysteries among Greeks and barbarians, taught concerning it.—Warburton. The Divine Legation, b. ii. s. 4.

Cicero, in his first book of Divination, where he laboured to assert the reality of such a power in the Pagan world, was able to produce nothing equal, or comparable to them.
Hurd. Works, vol. v. Ser. 4.

The comparative anatomy of brute animals has indeed been cultivated with some attention; and has been the source of the most useful discoveries in the anatomy of the human body. But the comparative animal economy of mankind and other animals, and comparative views of their states and manner of life, have been little regarded.
Gregory. Comparative View, &c. s. 1.

The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews shows at large that the Christian institution ought to take place of the Mosaic, upon account of the comparative weakness and unprofitableness of the first covenant.
Jortin. On the Christian Religion, Disc. 4.

To sympathize; to feel as others feel; to share, or participate the (painful) feelings of others; to pity, or commiserate.

For also to boundun men ghe hadden compassioun, and ghe resseyuyden with ioie the robbyng of ghoure goodis, knowynge that ghe han a better and a dwellinge substaunce.
Wiclif. Ebrewis, c. 10.

And if so be our destinee be shape
By eterne word to dien in prison,
Of our lignage have som compassion
That is so low ybrought by tyrannie.
Chaucer. The Knightes Tale, v. 1112

And I wonder that M. More can laugh at it, and not rather weepe for compassion, to see the soules for which Christ shed his bloud to perish.—Tyndall. Workes, p. 300.

Instead of compassionating and relieving the loss and miseries of our distressed bretheren, every man is ready to run upon the spoils, and, as if it were from some plundered enemy is eagerly busie in carrying away what riches soever come to hand.—Bp. Hall. Cases of Conscience, Dec. 1. c. 9.

For this Senecio I have no compassion, because he was taken, as we say, in ipso facto, still labouring in the work of avarice; but the poor rich man in Saint Luke (whose case was not like this) I could pity methinks if the Scripture would permit me.—Cowley. Shortness of Life, Ess. 9.

Fiue moones were in heau'ns concaue nightly seene,
As if that heau'n vpon our state below,
Foreseeing our harmes compassionate had been,
And had foresent them with their shine to show
To purblind England her approaching woe.
Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 687.

So the fines imposed there were the more questioned, and repined against, because they were assigned to the rebuilding and repairing St. Paul's Church; and thought therefore to be the more severely imposed, and the less compassionately reduced and excused.—Clarendon. History, vol. i. p. 94.

This ought carefully to be watched, and early remedied, so as to settle and cherish the contrary, and more natural temper of benignity and compassion in the room of it.
Locke. Of Education, s. 117.

Out of humanity he [a good judge] should desire, that no man may incurr the blemish of guilt or pain of suffering; he should tender the partie's case as compassionable, and desire that he may be delivered from the evil threatening him.
Barrow, vol. i. Ser. 20.

Then with a kind compassionating look,
And sighs, bespeaking pity ere he spoke,
Few words he said; but easy those and fit,
More slow than Hybla-drops, and far more sweet.
Dryden. Absalom & Achitophel.

The more they have the better humour'd they should be taught to be, and the more compassionate, and gentle to those of their brethren, who are placed lower, and have scantier portions.—Locke. Of Education, s. 117.

How kindly and compassionately soever, we, as private Christians, are to treat those that differ from us, and pursue a wrong way out of conscience; yet this doth not hinder, but that both wholesome laws may be made, for the restraining the exorbitancies of mistaken zeal; and, when these laws are made, that they may be put in execution.
Sharp, vol. i. Ser. 10.

Wisdom and worth are sacred names; rever'd,
Where not embrac'd, applauded! deified!
Why not compassioned too?—Young. Complaint, Night 7.

Compassion is that species of affection, which is excited, either by the actual distress of its object, or by some impending calamity which appears inevitable. The etymology of the word expresses this idea with strict propriety; as it signifies suffering with the object.
Cogan. On the Passions, s. 3.

And can either of these objects be indifferent to us? Be it but the latter of the two, [keeping up and promoting the faith in professed Christians] it must deeply affect a good and compassionate mind.—Hurd. Ser. Feb. 16, 1781.

COMPA'TIBLE. } Mid. Lat. Compatiri, which COMPATIBI'LITY. } Vossius, (de Vitiis,) says is sometimes used for convenire. Fr. Compatible; It. Compatevole, compatibile; Sp. Compatible;—concurrable, which can abide or agree together, or endure or bear with one another. Fr. Compatir, to suffer, endure, abide or bear with one another, to agree or accord together. Of the same origin as Compassion, (qv.)

It is also written competible in our old writers; perhaps from a supposed connexion with competent. See COMPETE.

Agreeable, according, suitable, consistent.

But the churche both knoweth & confesseth, that wedlocke & priesthod be not repugnant but compatible of their nature, and that wedded men haue been made priestes and keep styll theyr wyues.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 485.

But those formes which are so distincted, that they be not contrarie but dissimilar: are compatible in one subiect, as quantitie and qualitie, which being distincted in respect to their genus generalissimum, yet may be in one person.
Fox. Martyrs, p. 328. Prelats Answere.

At which time the prince's electors sent to signify, that they had chosen him King of the Romans, but the king refuseth to accept it, as being an honour out of his way, and scarce compatible with his state at home.
Baker. Edw. III. an. 1347.

Much to the same purpose hath holy Maximus in those admirable sections περι αγαπης, where most of the restraints he speaks of are competible to the unregenerate, φοβος ανθρωπων, &c. 1. Fear of men. 2. Denunciation of judgments from heaven. 3. Temperance and moral vertues.
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 62.

That this great extent of the senses horizon was a perfection easily competible to sinless humanity, will appear by the improvement of the following principles.
Glanvill. The Vanity of Dogmatizing, c. 1.

And this is the second ground of infidelity amongst Christians, the competibility of knowledge, and incompetibility of true faith, with carnall desires.
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 604.

I add, that these men's incredulity is hence more inexcusable, because the possibility of such a being, its existence, the compatibility and concurrence of such properties in one thing, is (as we otherwhere have largely showed) by a very plain instance declared, even by that being within every man, which in a degree partakes of all those properties.
Barrow, vol. ii. Ser. 9.

We have not only all the proofs of the genuineness of those writings, that can be given for any other writings, which are the most unquestionable in the world; but this over and above, which is compatible to none but these, namely, that the matter of these writings is of such a nature, that all mankind were concerned to detect the fraud and the forgery of them, if there had been any.
Sharp, vol. ii. Ser. 3.

Let us not encourage that fastidious disposition which is discontented with every thing short of perfection, and unreasonably require, as we sometimes do, a union of excellencies, not quite compatible with each other.
Sir J. Reynolds, Dis. 14.

On the contrary, no words can express the horrible cruelties and injustice that is wont to be done in this kind, not only on our shores, but in other nations also, upon the shipwrecked goods both of strangers, and our own compatriots.
Bp. Hall. Cases of Conscience, D. 1. c. 9.

There is also here St. Oen, the greatest sanctuary in the city, founded by one of our compatriots, as the name imports.
Howell, b. i. s. 1. Let. 15.

For Stephen Langton with the BB. of London and Ely, (thirsting after revenge, though with the destruction of their country, and bloud shed of innumerable their compatriots) going, &c.—Speed. King John, c. 8. s. 46.

She [Britain] rears to freedom an undaunted race;
Compatriot, zealous, hospitable, kind,
Her's the warm Cambrian; her's the lofty Scot.
Thomson. Liberty, pt. v.

If you would inspire this compatriot of ours with pity or regard, for one of these; would you not hide that distinction?
Burke. Vindication of Natural Society.

——— Praise enough
To fill the ambition of a private man,
That Chatham's language was his mother's tongue,
And Wolf's great name compatriot with his own.
Cowper. Task, b. ii.

How happened it that he did not employ hero-worship to this purpose (so natural a superstition that it became universal) rather than the whimsical and monstrous practice of brute worship, not symbolical, when direct hero-worship would have served his purpose so much better; religious zeal for the exclusive honour of a dead citizen being likely to rise much higher than reverence to a compatriot animal.
Warburton. The Divine Legation, b. iv. s. 4.

COMPE'ER, v. } Fr. Compère, n.; Lat.
COMPE'ER, n. } Compar. See COMPARE.

An equal, a fellow, an associate or companion upon equal terms.

With him ther rode a gentil Pardonere
Of Rouncevall, his friend and his compere,
That strait was comen from the court of Rome.
Chaucer. The Prologue, v. 672.

Wherfore I pray both him and his compeere,
To beare with that which I have written heere.
Gascoigne. The Fruits of Warre.

And therefore sending for therle of Salisbury his felow and compere in all his doynges, counsailes, and fortunes, (after long communicació had, of the quene's misgouernaunce, and how she without their assent, did all thynges at her wyll and pleasure) determined to raise a greate army and by fine force, either to die or win their purpose.
Hall. Hen. VI. an. 37.

Gon. Not so hot:
In his own grace he doth exalt himself,
More than in your addition.
Reg. In my rights,
By me invested, he compeers the best.
Shakespeare. Lear, Act v. sc. 3

For let the king know, gentle heralds, truly,
How his descent from his great throne, to honour
A stranger subject with so high a title,
As his compeer in arms, hath conquer'd more
Than any sword could do.
Ford. Perkin Warbeck, Act v. sc. 1.

Now, while the drowsy world lies lost in sleep,
Let me associate with the serious night,
And contemplation her sedate compeer.—Thomson. Winter.

Thy arduous task is now begun,
And, starting from a nobler goal,
Heroes and kings of ages past,
Are thy compeers. Whitehead, Ode 6.

COMPE'NABLE. Companionable; fit for company. See COMPANY.

He is the muriest of mouthe, at metes ther he suteth
And compenable in companye, as Crist hym self techeth.
Piers Ploukman, p. 282.

He [God] thought it vnconuenient to leaue him all alone, and so joyned to him a liuing creature, most like vnto him of minde and shape: with whose conuersation and compenable wordes, he might sweetly spend his time.

And anoon Jhesus compellide the disciplis to go up into a boot and go bifore him ouer the see while he left the peple.
Wiclif. Matthew, c. 14.

Finally, what doth thy compulsion and violence? Verily nothing but make a starke hypocrite, for no man can compel the hart to beleue a thing except it see euidence and sufficiente profe.—Frith. Works, p. 57.

He now that is renewed in Christ, keepeth the law without any law written or compulsion of any ruler or officer, saue by the leadyng of the spirite onely.—Tyndall. Workes, p. 114.

But when he saw yt he myght not reconsyle them by fayre meanys, he then vsed compulsaress, & denouced them accursed, but if they restored the goodes of the churche by a serteyn day.—Fabyan, vol. i. c. 237.

They that of theyr owne good wyll do these, haue no nede to be pricked foorth with compulsories of the lawe, for them theyr owne innocencie maketh free from it.—Udal. Gal. c. 5.

The Booke of Common Prayer doth greatly commend, and like the receyuing of the whole church together, but if that can not be obteyned (as it cannot, and they will not haue men compelled vnto it) it secludeth not those that be well disposed; so they be a competent number.
Whitgift. Defence, p. 530.

Now in the state of Israel under kings, was there any earthly power by which those kings were compellable to any thing, or any subject allowed to resist them in any case whatsoever.—Hobbs. De Corpore Politico, pt. ii. p. 79.

And if it were done, what pleasure shall the compelled party have of the compeller, or what trust can the compeller have of the compelled?
Strype. Life of Sir T. Smith. On the Queen's Marriage.

If it be obscure, then she [the church] sees it obscurely, for she sees it as it is, or else she sees it not at all: and therefore must declare it to be so: that is, probably, obscurely, peradventure: but not evidently, compellingly, necessarily.—Bp. Taylor. On the Real Presence, s. 2.

That there ought to be no compulsion vsed in matters of religion and fayth, and that none should be punished for their conscience.—Whitgift. Defence, p. 50.

——— Which is no other

But to recouer of vs by strong hand
And terms compulsative, those foresaid lands
So by his father lost.—Shakespeare. Hamlet, Act i. sc. 1.

After waiting and voiding, he thinks to void my second argument, and the contradictions that will follow both in the law and gospel, if the Mosaic law were abrogated by our Saviour, and a compulsive prohibition fix'd instead.
Milton. Doctrine, &c. of Divorce.

If therefore divorce may be so natural, and that law and nature are not to go contrary; then to forbid divorce compulsively, is not only against nature, but against law.
Id. Ib.

Truly I have nothing but a piece of unlegible parchment, which cannot satisfy my understanding of the legalness of my convention before you: but being I am not able to dispute that power that compulsively brought me, but here I am.
State Trials. Lieut. Col. J. Lilburn, an. 1649.

By what compulsory can the ecclesiastick state inforce him? If you threaten to drive him from the communion, he hath prevented you; he never comes at it. If from prayers, you do him a kindness: for he loves them not. If from sermons, then he will enjoy his lust without controlment.—Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. iii. c. 4.

That the other apostles were by a personal privilege as infallible as himself, is no reason to hinder the exercise of jurisdiction or any compulsory power over them; for though in faith they were infallible, yet in manners and matter of fact as likely to erre as St. Peter himself was.
Id. Liberty of Prophesying, s. 7.

To say that the more capable, or the better deserver, hath such a right to govern, as he may compulsorily bring under the less worthy, is idle.—Bacon. Of an Holy War.

These powers infold the Greek and Trojan train
In war and discord's adamantine chain,
Indissolubly strong; the fatal tye
Is stretch'd on both, and close compell'd they die.
Pope. Homer. Iliad, b. xiii.

But some of us with our swords forced them to retire for the present; and the house resolved to rise without giving any answer, judging it below them to do any thing by compulsion.—Ludlow. Memoirs, vol. i. p. 178.

Religion is in its nature a trial or probation of men's hearts; and is therefore essentially inconsistent with all compulsive motives, with such motives as destroy the nature of a trial or probation.—Sharp, vol. iv. Ser. 6.

These phenomena ought the more to be acquiesced in, because they may safely be looked upon as genuine declarations, which nature makes of her own accord, and not as confessions extorted from her by artificial and compulsory experiments.—Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 660.

Before the sun has gilt the skies,
Returning labour bids me rise
Obedient to the hunter's horn,
He quits his couch at early morn,
By want compell'd, I dig the soil,
His is a voluntary toil.—Cotton, Fab. 5.

What at last is the difference between him that is taxed by compulsion without representation, and him that is represented by compulsion in order to be taxed?
Johnson. Taxation no Tyranny.

He [the debtor] is impoverished by compulsive traffick, and at last overwhelmed, in the common receptacles of misery, by debts, which without his own consent were accumulated on his head.—Idler, No. 22.

This contribution threatening to fall infinitely short of their hopes they soon made it compulsory both in the rate and in the levy, beginning in fraud and ending as all the frauds of power end, in plain violence.
Burke. Regicide Peace, Let. 3.

COMPELLA'TION, n. Lat. Compellare, (con, and pellare.) Pellare est voce citare, ut quis adsit et prope nos veniat, (Martinius.)

Compellation seems to be used simply for name; language of address. See APPELLANT.

Like that of the thrush and swallow in Æsope, instead of mutual love, kind compellations, whore and thiefe is heard, they fling stools at one another's heads.
Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 69.

The king took very little time to consider who should be his successor, but the very next time the Bishop of London (who was longer on his way home than the king had been) came to him, his majesty entertained him very chearfully with his compellation, My Lord's Grace of Canterbury, you are very welcome.—Clarendon. Hist. of Rebellion, b. i. p. 89.

How familiarly doth Moses heare of his end! It is no more betwixt God and Moses, but, Goe up and dye. If he had invited him to a meale, it could not have been in a more sociable compellation.—Bp. Hall. Cont. The Death of Moses.

He useth this endearing compellation, my little children, the better to shew the great care and love he had for them: such as a father hath for his little children, that they might be the more ready to hearken to that fatherly advice he was now to give them.—Bp. Beveridge, vol. i. Ser. 69.

In that compellation wherewith our Lord begins his prayer, Our Father which art in heaven; the word, heaven, when thus applied to God does not signify literally a particular place, in point of situation; but figuratively, a state of highest dignity and supreme dominion.—Clarke, vol. i. Moreouer, towarde the acquiring of maiestie, thre thinges be required in the oration of a man hauyng autorite, that it be compendious, sententious, and delectable.
Sir T. Elyot. Governorr, b. ii. c. 2.

Saint Paule therefore Inspyred wyth the spirit of God, compendiously toucheth in very few wordes, both these two pointes at ones, where he wryteth vnto Titus: That man that is an heretike after ones or twise warning: voide & eschewe him.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 1036.

Trie therefore all doctrine. Wherewith shall we trie it: with the doctrine of the apostles, and with the Scripture which is the touchstone, ye and because ye loue compendiousnesse, ye shall haue a short rule to trie them withall.
Tyndall. Workes, p. 414.

Now my Lord, to write a history of Dr. Goad his journey and mine own, between Rotterdam and Dort that night on which we came from your L. would move too much pity, especially if you should make relation of the same to my lady: the compend of it is this.
Balcanqual to Sir D. Carleton, April, 1619.

So that our Saviour's expression in my text is to be construed as a compendious speech or figure, wherein together with the duty of forgiveness of injuries he teacheth us from whom the reconcilement or overture thereof is to begin; namely, from him who hath done the wrong.
Mede. Works, Dis. 46.

And if it be sufficient for a man at least to cry for pardon for having all his life time neither regarded laws nor conscience, certainly they have found out a better compendium of religion, and need not be troubled with variety of rules and cautions of carefulness and a lasting holiness.
Bp. Taylor. On Repentance, Pref.

And verily, wise Lycurgus framed and exercised his citizens immediately from their childhood by keeping them down at the first with silence to this short and sententious kind of speech, whereby they spake alwaies compendiously, and knit up much in a little.—Holland. Plutarch, p. 167.

It is a compend and recapitulation of the Mosaical law, and that was all that was imported by the word Deuteronomy.—Burnet. Hist. of the Reformation, an. 1527.

Who then can admire, if the inviting easiness and compendiousness of this assertion should so dazle the eyes of our atheist, that he overlooks those gross absurdities, that are so conspicuous in it!—Bentley, Ser. 9.

The faith, then, whereby all those excellent persons, of whose acts and sufferings we have a compendium or abridgment in this chapter, came unto God, i. e. devoted themselves to his worship and service, and in so doing pleased him,—was a faith respecting God as the μισθαποδοτης, the rewarder of all his faithful servants.—Bp. Bull, vol. i. Ser. 14.

"We should live soberly, righteously," or justly; that is, according to the proper and original meaning of the word, [δικαιως] giving to all their due. What that due is, the gospel hath ascertained, not, like the mere moralists, by a system of rules only, but by infusing a principle which reduces the law to a compend, and teaches the whole at once, in its utmost extent.—Bp. Horne. Infl. of Christianity, Dis. 31.

The text of the beloved John
Has all, that words can say in one;
For God is love—compendious whole
Of all the blessings of a soul.—Byrom. Love of God.

How much more compendiously and commodiously has the new historian of Great Britain enforced the same charge against Christianity.—Warburton. Church & State, b. ii.

With golde, wherof it was compensed.—Gower. Con. A. b. iii.

The joyes and feasts of the two marriages were compensed with the mournings, and funerals of Prince Arthur (of whom we haue spoken) and of Queene Elizabeth, who dyed in childbed in the Tower, and the child liued not long after.
Bacon. Hen. VII. p. 208.

There is in the elements a notable compensation of their fourefold qualities, dispencing themselves by even turnes and just measures.—Hakewill. Apologie, p. 113.

This rule requires that the authority be supreme, that the cause be just, that the end be publick, that the good be general, that the people receive advantage. Which is to be understood of tribute which is not penal, nor compensatory.
Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. iii. c. 2.

This they knew was the most effectual course to render them odious to all governours, who are apt to suspect all new things as dangerous, and think no truth can compensate the hazard of alterations.—Stillingfleet, vol. ii. Ser. 1.

Not having any certain knowledge of a future state of reward, (though the wisest of them did indeed hope for it, and think it highly probable;) they were forced, that they might be consistent with their own principles, to suppose the practise of virtue a sufficient reward to itself in all cases, and a full compensation for all the sufferings of the world.
Clarke. On the Attributes.

——— Are they not all proofs,
That man, immur'd in cities, still retains

The president telleth us that the Campenses remonstrants, who had been lately peremptorily cited to compeare before the Synod were not come, but that they had sent three others in their place to plead their cause.
Dr. Balcanqual. To Sir D. Carleton, Feb. 1619.

To the second, that they were coming, but were hindered by the people, it was answered that a seditious tumultuary concourse of people, ought not to hinder any man from comparence before a judge, especially since it is known that this seditious conflux was procured by the citati.—Id. Ib.

dere, expandere; to spread, stretch, or reach after. Competere est una petere; simul petere; and hence concurrere, convenire, to run, to come, together. And hence—

To compete is—to seek after, or strive, or endeavour to attain, that which another is seeking after or striving to attain, (sc.) in rivalry, in emulation: and, in Shakespeare, simply in society with, as an associate, as a confederate.

"Venir en compétence avec un autre,—to strive, or contend for, to make equal claim to a thing with another; to challenge, covet, or sue for a thing, as well as another; also to paragon, or compare himself, or to be laid in equal balance with another; to make or hold himself every way as good as another." And, consequentially—

Competent is—convenient, meet, fit, or suitable, or adapted; sufficient, adequate, or proportioned to.

Competible,—see COMPATIBLE.

To compete is, now, not uncommon in speech.

The ignorant ministers being charitably amoued from their ecclesiasticall cures hauyng competent in other trades of lyfe to rest vpon, and reasonable necessarie prouision for the honest mayntenaunce of learnyng & good ministers beyng had, &c.—Udal. The Prologue to the Ephesians.

The thynges wherewith the body is nourished and fostred vp, ought to be desyred but competently; and yet the common sorte are sore turmoyled with care for them.
Id. Paraphrase on Matthew, c. 5.

Also they, hauynge of theyr owne reuennues certayne, wherby they haue competente substaunce to lyue withoute takynge rewardes: it is lykely, that they wyll not be so desirous of lucre (wherof may be engendred corruption) as they, whiche haue very lyttell or nothynge so certayne.
Sir T. Elyot. Governorr, p. 14.

And therfore to a hole man it were better, to fede at one meale competently on very grosse meate only, so that it be swete, and his nature do not abhorre it, than on diuers fyne meates, of sondry substance and qualities.
Id. Castel of Helth, b. ii.

But the Socinians who concluded that this was not thus, because they knew not how it could be thus, are highly to be reproved for their excess in the inquiries of reason, not where she is not a competent judge, but where she is not competently instructed.—Bp. Taylor. Rule of Cons. b. i. c. 2.

When this Leyr or Leyth, after some writers, was fallen into competent age, being desirous to know the minde of his three daughters, he first demaunded of Gonorilla the eldest how well she loued him.—Grafton. Leyr, pt. i.

For it is not true that whatsoever is taught us by natural reason is bound upon us by a natural law; which proposition, although I have already prov'd competently, yet I shall not omit to add some things here to the illustration of it.
Id. Ib. b. ii. c. 3.

——— Liberty
To all such as desire to make return
Into their countries; and, unto those that stay
A competence of land freely allotted
To each man's proper use, no lord acknowledged.
Massinger. The Bondman, Act iv. sc. 2.

Now for the right understanding of this sufficiency we are to pray for, we must know, that a competency is twofold: either in regard of nature, which sufficeth to support a man in his natural life and health: or secondly, a competency in regard of a man's condition, which is sufficient to support and maintain that condition, order, degree, and calling, wherein God hath placed him.—Mede. Works, Dis. 28.

Here our great senate's orders I may quote,
The first in age is still the first in vote,
Nor honour, nor high birth, nor great command
In competition with great years may stand.
Denham. Of Old Age, pt. iii.

Competition of riches, honour, command, or other power, inclineth to contention, enmity, and war; because the way of one competitor to the attaining of his desire, is to kill, subdue, supplant, or repell the other. Particularly, competition of praise, inclineth to a reverence of antiquity.
Hobbs. Of Man, c. 11.

Boyet. Nauar had notice of youre faire approach;
And he, and his competitors in oath,
Were all addrest to meete you, gentle lady,
Before I came.—Shakes. Love's Labour Lost, Act ii. sc. 1.

The two famous flourishing universities, Oxford and Cambridge; with whom the Grecian Athens itself was no fit competitress.—Heraogonist. or Corah's Doom, (1672), p. 136.

Queen Anne, being now without competitris for her title thought herself secure.—Ld. Herbert. Hist. of Hen. VIII.

When any person pretends a divine commission to publish a new doctrine; in order to procure its reception, 'tis requisite he should be furnished with some competent motives of credibility.—Atterbury, vol. iii. Ser. 8.

When we have proved, for instance, that there is an intelligent, eternal, self-existent being (one or more,) which is most easily proved from our own existence; we have then competently proved, that there is a God, tho' we have not yet proved, or considered every attribute that belongs to him.
Law. Enquiry, pt. ii. c. 1.

Preserve, Almighty Providence!
Just what you gave me, competence;
And let me in those shades compose
Something in verse as true as prose;
Remov'd from all th' ambitious scene,
Nor puff'd by pride, nor sunk by spleen.
Swift. Horace, b. ii. Sat. 6.

But they ought to consider, that when these two parts of religion come in competition, devotion is to give way to charity, mercy being better than sacrifice.—Tillotson, vol. i. Ser. 18.

It is to be noted, that at the election of Hatton, Robert, Earl of Essex, a popular and ambitious person, was his competitor.—Wood. Fasti Oxon.

My son, give me thy heart, says God; that is, come to me with a sincere and unfeigned design of serving me, surrender up all to me, all thy inclinations and affections without reserve; and give me possession of thy soul, without any rival or competitor.—Atterbury, vol. iv. Ser. 11.

There are, who deaf to mad ambition's call,
Would shrink to hear th' obstreperous trump of Fame;
Supremely blest, if to their portion fall
Health, competence, and peace.
Beattie. The Progress of Genius, b. i.

In the first place, the loan demonstrates, in regard to instrumental resources, the competency of this kingdom to the assertion of the common cause, and to the maintenance and superintendance of that, which it is its duty, and its glory to hold, and to watch over the balance of power throughout the Christian world.—Burke. On a Regicide Peace, Let. i.

There is I think not one of the liberal arts which may not be competently learned in the English language.
Idler, No. 19.

Humility is among the greatest of Christian virtues. But amidst the variety of competitions, with which the world abounds, it is a difficult matter to guard against pride and self-consequence.—Gilpin, vol. i. Hints for Sermons, p. 13.

How when competitors like these contend,
Can surly virtue hope to fix a friend;
Slaves that with serious impudence beguile,
And lie without a blush, without a smile.
Johnson. London.

COMPI'LE, v. } Lat. Compilare; Fr. Compiler; It. Compilare; Sp. Compilar. From the Gr. Πιλεῖν, densare, constipare, cogere in unum; to stow thick or close, to collect or gather into one.

Jewell. A Replie to M. Hardinge, p. 237.

But louing Eustace, that with ielous eie
Beheld the worth of Sophia's noble childe,
And his faire shape did secretly envie,
Beside the vertues in his breast compilde,
(And for in loue he would no companie)
He stor'd his mouth with speeches smoothly filde.
Fairefax. Godfrey of Bovlogne, b. v. s. 8.

These pattes of friends in peace and settled rest
Id. Ib. b. iv. c. 9.

First, that by such a gentle drying [of brick] much time will be lost, which might otherwise be employed in compiling.—Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 13.

When I came home and was again resolved unto mine owne simplicity, I found it fitter for my pen (at least in this first publick adventure) to deal with these plain compilements, and tractable materials, than with the labyrinths and mysteries of courts and states.—Id. p. 4.

Such is the idea of a being absolutely perfect, no arbitrarious or fortuitous figment, or forced complement of notions that jarre one with another, or may be justly suspected, if not demonstrated, to be incoherent and repugnant.
H. More. App. to Antidote, c. 8.

Now who could know this better than Eusebius, who had searched into and perused all the writings and monuments of Christian antiquity then extant, for the compiling of his Ecclesiastical History, and his Commentaries of the Acts of Martyrs now perished.—Mede. Works, b. ii. Dis. on Churches.

That they cannot be meant of Christ's natural body and blood, every one, who knows the principles of the compilers of the catechism and doctrine of our church, not only allows, but contends.—Hoadly. Of the Sacrament.

They have often no other task than to lay two books before them, out of which they compile a third, without any new materials of their own, and with very little application of judgment to those which former authors have supplied.—That all compilations are useless, I do not assert; particles of science are often very widely scattered.—Idler, No. 85.

COMPI'NGE. Lat. Compingere, (con, and pangere.) See COMPACT.

To put together, to join, unite, knit, or connect together.

The Patriarchs and their families, the Israelites a handfull in respect, Christ and his apostles, and not all of them, neither, into what straights hath it beene compinged,—a little flock.—Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 640.

Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 193.

O thou in heav'n and earth the only peace
Found out for mankind under wrauth, O thou
My sole complacence.—Milton. Paradise Lost, b. iii.

I by conversing cannot these erect
From prone, nor in their wayes complacence find.
Id. Ib. b. viii.

Out of the sense of this happy union ariseth an unspeakable complacency and delight of the soul in that God and Saviour, who is thus inseparably ours, and by whose union we are blessed.—Bp. Hall. The Devout Soul.

The inward complacence we find in acting reasonably and virtuously, and the disquiet we feel from vicious choices and pursuits, is protracted beyond the acts themselves, from whence it arose; and renewed often upon our souls by distant reflexions.—Atterbury, vol. iv. Ser. 4.

The Pharisee, who was no scandalous sinner, but framed his outward conversation according to the precepts of the law, yet because he thought too high of himself, was not sensible of his defects, but took a vain complacency in the goodness of his own performances, and despised others; this man and his prayer were rejected.
Sharp. Works, vol. iv. Ser. 3.

Nor such thy lot, O Bourton; nor from sight
Retirest thou, but, with complacent smile,
Thy social aspect courts the distant eye.
Jago. Edge-Hill. Evening, b. iv.

In strict propriety of language, complacency is alone applicable to that species of good, which originates from some mental or moral excellence.—Cogan. On the Passions, s. 3.

They [our affections] may be placed upon objects whose situations do not require either our sympathetick joys or sorrows. These are most properly expressed by complacential regards; for they consist both in the approbation of the mind and feelings of the heart.—Id. Ib.

COMPLA'IN, v. } Fr. Complaindre; It. Compiagnere; Lat. Con, and plangere, which (Vossius) properly is verberare, to beat: plangere, from plagere; and plagere, from the ancient COMPLA'INABLE.
COMPLA'INANT, n.
COMPLA'INER.
COMPLA'INING, n.
COMPLA'INT, n.
Gr. Πλαγειν, to strike. Plangere, (Vossius) began to denote especially,—prae dolore caput aut pectus percutere; i. e. through, or on account of, grief, to strike the head or breast. And as subsequently applied,—loudly or clamorously to express, declare, or manifest grief. As now used, to complain, is—

To utter grief, sorrow, or discontent; to deplore, to bewail, to lament; to express, declare, or proclaim dissatisfaction or uneasiness; to allege cause of disapprobation or censure.

Yet saw I woodnesse laughing in his rage.
Armed complaint.—Chaucer. The Knightes Tale, v. 2015.

And in a lettre wrote he all his sorwe,
In manere of a complaint or a lay,
Unto his faire freshe lady May.
Id. The Marchantes Tale, v. 9756.

He was dispeired, nothing dorst he say,
Sauf in his songes somwhat wold he wray
His wo, as in a general complaining;
He said, he loved, and was beloved nothing.
Id. The Frankeleines Tale, v. 11,257.

Without any semblant feigned,
She hath her loue's death compleined.—Gower. Con. A. b. ii.

The Frenchmen hated him bycause they doubted hym: yet I herde his dethe greatly complayned among right noble and valyant knyghtes of France, saying, that it was a great dommage of his dethe.

And the complaynour has been founde in his complayninge so verye shameless false, that he hathe been answered that he was to easely dealt with, and hadde wrong that he was no worse serued.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 906.

These are murmurers, complainers, walkynge after theyr owne lusts, whose mouthes speak proude thynges
Bible, 1551. Judas.

By all our country rights in Rome maintained,
And by chaste Lucrece' soul that late complained
Her wrongs to us, and by this bloody knife,
We will revenge the death of this true wife
Shakespeare. Rape of Lucrece.

Yet sometime doth the comedie excite
Her voyce and angry Chremes chafes out right
With swelling throat: and oft the tragick wight
Complains in humble phrase.
B. Jonson. Horace. The Art of Poetrie.

Sometimes he [the profane man] mocks at that, which for its relation to the Deity, and its service, should never but with reverence be look'd upon: so that, though both be blameable, yet superstition is less complainable
Feltham, pt. i. Res. 36.

Christ is left alone: alone in respect of these complaynants; not alone in respect of the multitude.
Bp. Hall. Cont. The Woman taken in Adultery.

She quickly rose, and ready now to go,
"Remember measure in your griefs complaining,
His last, his dying words command you so"
P. Fletcher. Eliza.

Jehovah to my words give ear,
My meditation weigh,
The voice of my complaining hear
My King, my God; for unto thee I pray.—Milton, Ps. 5.

Sadly he [Mars] went and sate by Jove, shew'd his immortal bloud,
That from a mortall-man-made-wound powr'd such an impious floud,
And (weeping) powr'd out these complaints; O Father, storm st thou not
To see us take these wrongs from men.
Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. v.

To say, That if we know the real essences or internal constitutions of those beings, some of whose properties we know, we should have much more certain knowledg concerning those things and their properties, I am sure is true, and I think no fault*y complaining*; and if it be, I must own myself to your lordship to be one of those complainers.
Locke. Letter to the Bp. of Worcester.

That in those days they had frequent intercourse with the Deity, and were made sensible of his peculiar presence in some places, appears farther, from his discourse with Cain, both before and after the murder of his brother; as also from Cain's complaint of being hid from his face, and his going out from the presence of the Lord.
Law. Theory of Religion, pt. ii.

But if pity inspire thee, renew the sad lay,
Mourn, sweetest complainer, man calls thee to mourn!
O soothe him, whose pleasures like thine pass away—
Full quickly they pass—but they never return.
Beattie. Hermit.

Is this the land where Gray's unlabour'd art
Soothes, melts, alarms, and ravishes the heart
Where the lone wanderer's sweet complainings flow
In simple majesty of manly woe.
Id. On a Supposed Monument to Churchill.

I wrote merely for myself, as a friend of the dead, and to ease my full soul by breathing out my own complaints.
Watts. On the Death of Thomas Gunston, Esq.

COMPLAISA'NT. } Fr. Complaisant, complaisance.
COMPLAISA'NTLY,
COMPLAISA'NCE.

Complaisance and Complaisant, are but the French manner of writing complacent and complacence. See them above; and also the example from Hobbs, below. Complaisant is—

Desirous, wishing to please or gratify, to oblige, to conciliate (others).

Complaisant nymph! who dost thou kindly share
In griefs whose cause thou dost not know,
Hadst thou but eyes, as well as tongue and ear,
How much compassion wouldst thou show!
Cowley. Echo.

While then I simply walkt, nor heed could take
Of complacence, that sly deceitful snake.
Beaumont. In Desolation.

A fifth law of nature is complaisance; that is to say, That every man strive to accommodate himself to the rest.
Hobbs. Of Man, pt. i. c. 15.

As for our Saviour he was a person so far from being morose or reserved in his carriage, or a lover of singularity, so far from setting up a way of conversation of his own making, distinct from the way he found in the world, that he was the most free, obliging, and civil, and, if I durst use the word, I would say, the most complaisant person, that ever perhaps appeared in the world.—Sharp, vol. v. Dis. 8.

One who thought to outshine the whole court, carried his head so over complaisantly, that this martial prince [Alexander the Great] gave him so great a box on the ear, as set all the heads of the court upright.—Tatler, No. 77.

Then, for th' encouragement and propagation
Of such a great concernment to the nation,
All people were so full of complaisance
And civil duty of the public sense
They had no name t' express a cuckold then,
But that which signifies all married men
Butler. Satire upon Marriage.

Fair Venus wept the sad disaster
Of having lost her favourite dove,
In complaisance poor Cupid mourn'd;
His grief reliev'd his mother's pain.—Prior. The Dove.

It was Cipius, I think, that formerly said, "I am not asleep for every man," neither am I, my dear Gallus, so uncomplaisant complaisant as to be the humble servant of every opinion.—Melmoth. Cicero, b. ix. Let. 19.

The Chinese complaisantly takes his bed
With his big wife, and is with caudle fed.
Warton. Fashion, a Satire.

They strive with their own hearts, and keep them down
In complaisance to all the fools in town.
O how they tremble at the name of prude!
And die with shame at thought of being good!
Young. Love of Fame, Sat. 6.

COMPLANATE, v. Lat. Complanare, atum, (planus,)—

To make even or level.

The vertebræ of the neck and back bone made short and complanated, and firmly braced with muscles and tendons, for easy incurvations of the body, but withal for greater strength, to support the body's own weight, together with other additional weights it may have occasion to bear.
Derham. Physico-Theology, b. v. c. 2.

COMPLEMENT, n. } Sp. Complemento; It. Compimento; Lat. Complementum. That which is added for the sake of finishing, or filling, (Gesner,) from com, and plere, to fill. Minshew and Lye consider comple- and compli-ment, (anciently written without discrimination,) to be the same word. Minshew calls complements,—"Ceremonies, accomplishments, making that perfect which was wanting." Lye,—inania quædam verba, et quasi complementa orationis. (See COMPLETE.) Skinner suggests that compliment is from comply, (q. d.) complyments. (See COMPLIMENTS.) Complement is now restricted to—COMPLE'MENTAL.

The whole, full, and entire number or quantity: the filling up so as to make the entire number or quantity.

This woorde [therfore] whiche signifyeth for the same cause, hath here in his last clause no necessarye place to the complement of the sentence following.
Sir T. More. Workes, p. 954.

In consideration wherof being vehemently moued by the damnified parties, he humbly besought your highness by his messengers and letters, for complement and execution of justice.—Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 153.

During which time came letters from the lords of the councell, straightly commaunding our generall, not to exceede his complement and number appointed him, which was, one hundred and twenty persons.—Id. Ib. vol iii p 61.

And all her sister nymphes with one consent,
Supplide her sobbing breaches with sad complement.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. iii. c. 4.

These three on men all gracious gifts bestowe,
Which decke the body and adorne the minde,
To make them louely or well fauoured showe
As comely carriage, entertainment kind,
Sweet semblant, friendly offices that binde,
And all the complements of courtesie.—Id. Ib. b. vi. c. 10.

One, who the musicke of his owne vaine tongue,
Doth raunish like inchanting harmonie;
A man of complements whom right and wrong
Haue chose as vmpire of their mutinie.
Shakespeare. Love's Labour Lost, Act I sc. 1.

Then doubtlesse they, [the people] and not kings are the chiefe soveraigne legislators, and their royall assents to lawes, are no wayes essentiall to the very being of lawes, but rather a complementall ceremony.
Prynne. Soveraigne Power of Parliaments, pt. i.

COMPLE'TE, v. } Sp. Completar; It. Compiere, compire; Fr. Completer; Lat. Complere, completum, to fill up, to fulfil; con, and pleo, from the obsolete Gr. Πλω, whence πληθω.
COMPLE'TE, adj.

COMPLE'TEMENT.
COMPLE'TENESS.
COMPLE'TION.
COMPLE'TIVE.
COMPLE'TORY, adj.
COMPLE'TORY, n.

To fill, fulfil or accomplish; to perfect, to perform fully, wholly, without omissions or deficiencies.

Completory, (Burnet,)—see COMPLINE.

The fourthe day complete fro none to none,
Whan that the highe messe was ydone
In halle sat this January and May.
Chaucer. The Marchantes Tale, v. 9767.

The whiche guyded ye lande full wysely by the tyme or space of v. yeres complete.—Fabyan, vol. i. c. 16.

Inwardly bewailing, that I did not performe and finally cõsummat, such pollitique diuises, and good and Godly ordinaunces, in my long life and pacifique prosperitie, whiche then I fully determined to haue begonne, set forwarde & completely to haue finished.—Hall. Edw. IV. an. 23.

And likewise every holy day, at even songe, between even songe and completorie, shall rehers the tenne commaundments, every one by it selfe and so cause his parochians to rehers after him every one by it selfe.
Burnet. Records, pt. iii. b. iii. No. 57. Injunctions.

——— Here, here, remains
Dust far more precious than in India's veins:
Within these cold embraces, ravish'd, lies
That which completes the age's tyrannies.
Denham. On the Death of Lord Hastings.

The royall bodie yet he left unspoild, religion charm'd
The act of spoyle; and all in fire, he burn'd him complete arm'd.
Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. vi.

Completely shiftless was thy native plight
And no self-succour would to thee allow;
Naked thou wert of every help beside
As well's of clothes, thy woful shame to hide.
Beaumont. Psyche, c. 19. s. 5.

It is as plainly declared to be a vengeance of fire that abides them, as a compleatment of their torments.
Glanvill. Pre-existence of Souls, c. 14.

Then it may be, they sadly reflect on their own folly, in that they have preferred the deluging scenes and pompous shews of worldly greatness, before the compleat and endless felicity of another life.—Stillingfleet, vol. ii. Ser. 3.

Then since no state's completely blest,
Let's learn the bitter to allay
With gentle mirth, and wisely gay
Enjoy at least the present day.
Hughes. Horace, Ode. 16. b. ii.

And allow me your patience, if it be not already tir'd with this long epistle, to give you from the best authors, the origine, the antiquity, the growth, the change, and the compleatment of satire among the Romans.
Dryden. Juvenal, Dedication.

It was attested by miracles of all sorts, done in great variety and number, by the visible centering of the old prophecies in the person of Christ, and by the completion of those prophecies since, which he himself uttered
Atterbury, vol. ii. Ser. 11.

I shall not so much generally consider the death and passion of our Lord, as the particular manner and kind thereof, by crucifixion; the which we may contemplate, as qualified with divers notable adjuncts; namely, as completory of ancient presignifications and predictions.
Barrow, vol. ii. Ser. 25.

When the prisoner, who was King Richard, heard the song he knew that Blondel must be the singer; and when Blondel paused about the middle, the king began the remainder, and completed it.—Warton, Ode 12. Advertisement.

For how can I think of you without being pierced with grief in the reflection, that I have made those completely miserable whom I ought and wished to have rendered perfectly happy!—Melmoth. Cicero. To Terentia, b. i. Let 7.

These discourses which I have written concerning perception, judgment, reasoning, and disposition, are the four integral parts of logic. This sort of parts goes to make up the completeness of any subject.—Watts. Logic, pt. i. c. 6. s. 7.

But the minds of the Apostles, full of the greatest ideas, and swelling with the suggestions of the Holy Spirit, which in no scanty measure was imparted to them, perpetually overflow, as it were, the subject of their discourse, and expatiate into other larger views, than seem necessary to the completion of the argument immediately presented to them.—Hurd. Sermon, Feb. 16, 1781.

And the three last, [tenses] the completive present, and completive past, and the completive future.
Harris. Hermes, b. i. c. 7.

COMPLEX, adj. } Sp. Complexo; It. Complesso; Fr. Complexe; Lat. Complecti, simul et totum plectere, (con, and plectere;) Gr. Πλεκ-ειν, to knit, or intertwine. (And see COMPLICE.) Complexus, as opposed to simplex, was probably introduced by the writers on Logic in the mid-ages. See also COMPLEXION, and COMPLICATE.
CO'MPLEXED, adj.
COMPLE'XEDNESS.
COMPLE'XITY.
COMPLE'XLY.
COMPLE'XNESS.
COMPLE'XURE, n.

Knit, or connected together, interwoven, involved, intricate.

Although there were more things in nature then words which did express them; yet even in these mute and silent discourses, to express complexed-significations, they took a liberty to compound and piece together creatures of allowable forms into mixtures inexistent.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. v. c. 20.

I do not restrain it purely and only to what corruption of nature you had at first, but withall as it is increased and so complexly corruption of nature as it now is grown up in us; for in-dwelling sin, in Paul's sence, is the whole stock of it, new and old.—Goodwin. Works, vol. iii. pt. i. p. 382.

The opposition of our bodyes in this disinterested love [of God] is counted to us an endearement of our hearts, when in this reluctancy of one halfe, we reduce our love to that degree of implicity which is compatible with this our complexure.—Mountague. Devout Essayes, pt. i. Treat. 14. § 3.

As these simple ideas are observed to exist in several combinations united together; so the mind has a power to consider several of them united together, as one idea; and that not only as they are united in external objects, but as it self has joined them. Ideas thus made up of several simple ones put together, I call complex; such as are beauty, gratitude, a man, an army, the universe; which though complicated of various simple ideas, or complex ideas, made up of simple ones, yet are, when the mind pleases, considered each by itself as one entire thing, and signified by one name.—Locke. Of Hum. Und. b. ii. c. 12.

Secondly, From the complexedness of these moral ideas there follows another inconvenience, (viz.) that the mind cannot easily retain those precise combinations so exactly and perfectly, as is necessary in the examination of the habitudes and correspondencies, agreements or disagreements, of several of them one with another.

Locke. Of Hum. Underst. b. iv. c. 3.

Instead of nature in the sixth sense of the word [for, an aggregate of the powers belonging to a body, especially a living one] we may employ the constitution, temperament, or the mechanism, or the complex of the essential properties or qualities.—Boyle. Works, vol. v. p. 169.

Nor to this evanescent speck of earth
Poorly confin'd, the radiant tracts on high
Are her exalted range; intent to gaze
Creation through; and from that full complex
Of never-ending wonders, to conceive
Of the sole Being right, who spake the word,
And nature mov'd complete. Thomson. Summer.

And amongst many other things I think he [Locke] would not have talked of the composition of ideas; but would have seen that it was merely a contrivance of language: and that the only composition was in the terms; and consequently that it was as improper to speak of a complex idea, as it would be to call a constellation a complex star: and that they are not ideas, but merely terms, which are general and abstract.—Tooke. Diversions of Purley, vol. i. p. 37.

Men are every now and then put, by complexity of human affairs, into strange situations; but justice is the same, let the judge be in what situation he will Burke. On Conciliation with America.

New establishments, civil and judicial, were therefore formed at a very great expense, and with much complexity of constitution.—Id. Rep. of a Com. on Affairs of India.

Taking tragedies complexly, I am fully persuaded, that the impressions left by them upon the mind, are, on the whole, favourable to virtue and good dispositions

Blair, vol. iii. Lect. 45.

If the declensions of the ancient languages are so very complex, their conjugations are infinitely more so. And the complexness of the one, is founded upon the same principle with that of the other, the difficulty of forming, in the beginnings of language, abstract and general terms

Smith. On the Formation of Languages.

COMPLE'XION. } Fr. Complexion; It. Complessione; Sp. Complexion, complession; Lat. Complexio, from Complecti, complexus, quia complexio, complectitur totum statum corporis, et omnes facultates ejus, (Minshew.)
COMPLE'XIONAL.
COMPLE'XIONALLY.
COMPLE'XIONARY.
COMPLE'XIONED.

The whole connexion of the parts; the whole composition, the compass, or comprehension of parts; the frame or texture; the temperament or disposition. Also applied, merely, to—

The general appearance, hue, or colour.

Watts uses complexion as equivalent to complexity.

A Frankelein was in this compagnie;
White was his berd as is the dayesie
Of his complexion he was sanguin.—Chaucer. Prol. v. 335.

Three men vpon election
Of age, and of complexion
Liche to hym selfe by all wale,
He toke towardes hym to plale,
And eate and dranke as well as hee.—Gower. Con. A. b. vi.

And also obserue, that she [the nourise] be of mature or ripe age, not vnder xx. yeres, or above xxx. her body also beynge clene from all sykenes, or deformitye, and hauing her complection mooste of the ryghte and pure sanguine.

Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. i. c. 4.

But I must be all way ready to cut of whatsoeuer I perceiue to strēgth the flesh against the spirit. And I must haue a diligent eye to the flesh and his complexion.

Tyndall. Workes, p. 228.

This was a man of feble complexion and sickly, and endured moche payne more than any other.

Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. i. c. 326.

There is therefore a twofold beatitude or blessedness: The one is perfect and consummate, the other initial and incompleat. The former is the complection of all good perfective of our natures, and our entire and satisfying enjoyment of it.—Hopkins. Works, p. 344. Ser. 3.

There might no other speech be had amongst the streams,
But only of this nymph, sweet Wandal, what she wore;
Of her complexion, grace, and how herself she bore.

Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 17.

For whatsoever is taught to them at first they believe infinitely, for they know nothing to the contrary, they have had no other masters whose theorems might abate the strength of their first persuasions, and it is a great advantage in those cases to get possession; and before their first principles can be dislodged, they are made habitual and complexional.—Bp. Taylor. Liberty of Prophesying, s. 11.

Scarce ended they this song, but Avon's winding stream,
By Warwick, entertains the high-complexion'd Leam.

Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 13.

A flower is the best complexioned grass (as a pearl is the best-coloured clay,) and daily it weareth God's livery, for "He cloatheth the grass in the field."

Fuller. Worthies. Norwich.

The Greek churches generally, and most of the Latin casuists, as I have heard from learned men and travellers, do allow even this complexionary art and use of adorning, by some light tincture, the looks of a woman eminent for virtue, modesty, piety, and charity.

Bp. Taylor. Artificial Handsomeness, p. 38.

For from all tempers he could service draw;
The worth of each, with its alloy he knew,
And as the confidant of nature saw
How she complexions did divide and brew.

Dryden. On the Death of Oliver Cromwell.

Instead of going out of our own complexional nature, unto that of others, 'twere a better and more laudable industry to improve our own, and instead of a miserable copy become a good original.—Spectator, No. 237.

His skin was of a dead white, without the least appearance of what is called complexion, though some parts of his body were in a small degree less white than others.

Cook. Voyage, vol. i. c. 10.

Where are the jesters now? the men of health,
Complectionally pleasant? Blair. Grave.

The melancholic fiend (that worst despair
Of physic) hence the rust-complexion'd man
Pursues, whose blood is dry, whose fibres gain
Too stretch'd a tone.

Armstrong. The Art of Preserving Health, b. i.

Though the terms of propositions may be complex, yet where the composition of the whole argument is thus plain, simple, and regular, it is properly called a simple syllogism, since the complexion, does not belong to the syllogistic form of it.—Watts. Logic, pt. iii. c. 2. s. 2.

COMPLICATE, v. } Sp. Complicar; Fr. Complication; Lat. Complicare, atum, Gr. Πλεκειν, to knit, to intertwine. Complex, icis, the noun, seems to have been introduced into the Latin apud posterioris ævi scriptores, and from it the French, Italian, Spanish, and also our own language have adopted complice,—socius sceleris. See ACCOMPLICE.
COMPLICATED, adj.
COMPLICATELY.
COMPLICATENESS.
COMPLICA'TION.
COMPLICE, n.

To intertwine, to interweave, to involve.

Complice,—one who is knitted, joined, or united with another; who co-operates with, aids or assists another.

After whose comynge, vpon a daye, he beynge in a churche, & herynge his deuine seruyce, was slayne of the sayd prouoste & his complyces.—Fabyan, vol. i. c. 231.

Item, in the yeere of our Lord 1396 one John Van Derlowe, Hans van Gelder, and other their complices of the Hans vilainously and vnlustly tooke a shippe of William Terry of Hull called the Cogge, with thirtie woollen broad cloathes and a thousand narrow clothes to the value of 200 pounds.

Hacklugt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 167.

For the particular actions of war, though they are complicate in fact, yet are they separate and distinct in right; like to cross suits in civil pleas, which are sometimes both just.

Bacon. Of a War with Spain.

——— Dreadful was the din
Of hissing through the hall, thick swarming now
With complicated monsters head and taile.

Milton. Paradise Lost, b. x.

Whereas notwithstanding they are, oft times three, and when but two, [the division of the root] commonly so complicated and crossed, that men for this deceit are fain to effect their design in other parts.—Brown. Vulg. Err. b. ii. c. 6.

For our hearts deceive us, our purposes are complicated, and we know not which end is principally intended, nor by what argument amongst many, we are finally determin'd.

Bp. Taylor. On Repentance, c. 3. s. 5.

There is a great variety of intelligibles in the world, much objected to our senses, much deducible from them by ratiocination and discourse, and every several object full of subdivided multiplicity and complicateness.

Hale. Origin. of Mankind, p. 3.

The duke of Yorke, that did not idle stand,
(But seeks to work on all advantages)
Had likewise in this course a secret hand,
And hearten'd on their chiefest 'complices.

Daniel. Civil Wars, b. v.

Avarice and luxury very often become one complicated principle of action, in those whose hearts are wholly set upon ease, magnificence and pleasure.—Spectator, No. 55.

Or yet for the mnemonical aid, otherwise than complicatedly, so as the one may suborn aid to the other, and both may invigorate the activity of the mind to a very useful promptness.—Boyle. Works, vol. vi. p. 359. Let. from J. Beale.

But lest you should mistake his meaning, you must take notice, that by sinning, he doth not mean any one particular sin, but a complication of sins, like that whereby the angels fell.—Bp. Beveridge, vol. ii. Ser. 63.

The prince had procured him to be sent over, on purpose to satisfy himself (and thereby his complices for the peace) that the king's intentions were determined to enter into the war, which his highness thought the only means to prevent the peace.—Sir Wm. Temple. Memoirs, pt. ii.

How poor, how rich, how abject, how august,
How complicate, how wonderful, is man!
How passing wonder he, who made him such!

Young. The Complaint, Night i.

See with what strength his harden'd loins are bound,
All over proof and shut against a wound.
How like a mountain cedar moves his tail!
Nor can his complicated sinews fail.

Id. Paraphrase on part of Job.

For by these very means have we seen one of the brightest stars in the firmament of the church (oh lamentable and heart breaking sight!) falling from the heaven of Christianity, into the sink and complication of Paganism, Quakerism, and Socinianism, mix'd up with chemistry and astrology, by a professed cobbler.—Bp. Horne. To the Readers of Mr. Law.

COMPLIMENT, v. } See COMPLE-MENT, and COMPLY. Mr. Steevens and Mr. Tyrwhitt think that "To comply" in Shakespeare's Hamlet, (Act ii. sc. 2, and Act v. sc. 2,) is used in the sense of "To compliment;" and Mr. Malone produces from an old poem, called "A Fig for Fortune," the verb to recomplie, (q.d.) to return a compliment; and thus they sanction the etymology of Skinner: as if Compliment were—COMPLIMENT, n.
COMPLIME'NTAL.
COMPLIME'NTALLY.
COMPLIME'NTALNESS.
COMPLIME'NTARY, n.

The kind compliance with the will of another; an act of such compliance, a verbal declaration of it;—a compliance or acquiescence, or assent, beyond what may appear necessary; viz. with an intent to please or flatter any weakness, any prepossession or prejudice.

See the quotations from Hammond.

And he that call'd Arsinoe Ioue's violet, kept all the letters of the name right, and complimented the lady ingeniously.—Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. iii. c. 2.

Yet not to be exact in the phrase of complement, or gestures of courtesie, the indifferent do pardon to those who have been otherwise busied.—Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 90.

True it is notwithstanding (omitting the old distinction) that there is great difference between these mannerly and complimental lies, with those which are sometime perswaded by necessity upon breach of promise; and those which men use out of cowardice and fear.

Raleigh. History of the World, b. v. c. 3. s. 2.

Complementalness, as opposed to plainness, must signifie giving titles of civility, that really do not belong to those, to whom they are thus given.—Hammond. Works, vol. ii. p. 292.

It is a great weakness, in understanding the nature of words, not to advert, that the vogue of the world altering from plainness to complementalness, as it doth still daily, the same word may be used without fear of pride at one time, which could not at another.—Id. Ib.

Amo. Is hee a master?
Cri. That, sir, he has to shew here; and confirmed under the hands of the most skilfull, and cunning complementarians alive, please you reade, sir.

B. Jonson. Cynthia's Revels, Act v. sc. 4.

[When ye come to church] ye must not stand looking about, and complementing with one another: nor suffer so much as your thoughts to be running after your worldly affairs.—Bp. Beveridge, vol. ii. Ser. 118.

As on one hand he [the upright man] is careful not to ruin himself into inconveniences by his good nature; so on the other hand, the kindness and good-will he possesseth to all about him, is more than a compliment, or the semblance of his countenance.—Sharp, vol. i. Ser. 5.

After some complimental talk,
Time met them, bow'd and join'd their walk.
Their chat on various subjects ran
But most what each had done for man.

Gay. Plutus, Cupid, & Time, Fable 13.

He has had the good fortune to make some discoveries, and the honour to have them publickly, and but too complimentally, taken notice of by the virtuosi.

Boyle. Works, vol. iv. p. 3.

Le Clerc himself fared no better than Moyle, and "Heretic" and "Free-thinker" were compliments often paid to him, and to which he was accustomed; which made him the more disposed to defend his fellow sufferers.
Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History.

I made complimentary verses on the great lords and ladies of the court, with as much simplicity and as little meaning as my bows in the drawing room, and thought it a fine thing to be taken notice of, as a wit, in the fashionable circles.
Hurd. Dialogue. Dr. H. More & Waller.

COMPLINE. Fr. Complie; Mid. Lat. Completa, completorum, complendæ. That ecclesiastical office which complet s (complet) and closes the Offices of the day.

his mind to them; apply to them. And thus to comply will be, (as commonly used,)—
To bend, lean or incline to, to yield or assent to; to give up, grant or concede, (sc.) to the wishes of another; to accommodate.

Unmov'd by all their fury, kept your ground,
Fix'd as the poles, whiles they kept twirling round:
Submitted to all rage, and lost your all,
Yet ne'er comply'd with, or low'd knee to Baal.
Brome. To his Rev. Friend, Dr S.

And that therefore if such theorems as the Pythagoreans held be found suitable and compliable with Moses his text, it is a shrewd presumption that that is the right philosophick cabbala thereof.—H. More. Philosophick Cabbala, c. 1.

It extendeth to enemies: If you see thine enemy's ox going astray, thou shalt bring it to him, Exodus xxiii. 4. Yet this might be done without love only in external compliance with the law.—Grew. Cosmo. Sacra, b. v. c. 5.

If we look on her as a wife, she was chaste and loving, fruitful and discreet, humble and pleasant, witty and complyant, rich and fair; and wanted nothing to the making her a principal and precedent to the best wives of the world, but a long life and a full age.—Bp. Taylor, vol. iii. Ser. 8.

——— To thir supper fruits they fell,
Nectarine fruits which the compliant boughes
Yielded them.—Milton. Paradise Lost, b. iv.

Finally, that in the changes of religion he was a complier.

A fairer person lost not heav'n, he seem'd
For dignity compos'd and high exploit
But all was false and hollow. Id. Ib.

In this hurry, one running one way, another running another way, a man was seen walking before the door very composedly without a hat, whereupon one crying out, here is the fellow that kill'd the duke, upon which others run thither, every body asking, which is he? which is he? to which the man without the hat very composedly answered I am he.—Clarendon. Rebellion, vol. i. b. i. p. 29.

Even such a one is he that learns theology in the school of Nature, if he seem to participate of any settledness or composedness of conscience.—Hales. Rem. Ser. 2 Pet. iii. 15.

He hath rifled Epicurus of his ἀοχλησια, tranquility or calm of mind, to the acquiring of which all his philosophy was designed, a thing so hugely pleasurable, that he has been taken for a carnal voluptuous swine ever since, upon no other merit but for seeking out these great composers of the soul, so much beyond all other sensuality.

Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 479.

The ways and motions whereof [prose] are so uncertain and undistinguished, like the way and motion of a ship in the sea, as not only to discompose the best composers, but also to disappoint sometimes the most attentive reader, and put him to hunt counter for the sense.

Hobbs. On Sir W. D'Avenant's Preface.

——— Lives centrall
Can frame themselves a right compositall,
While as they sitten soft in the sweet nyn
Or vitall vest of the lives generall.

More. On the Soul, pt. ii. c. 4. s. 9.

——— Whence woe
To entertain them fair with open front
And brest (what could we more?) propounded terms
Of composition, strait they chang'd thir minds
Flew off, and into strange vagaries fell,
As they would dance.—Milton. Paradise Lost, b. ii.

In these months of my silence, I have been busie (if any work of my brain may be termed a business) about certain compositions of mine own, partly imposed and partly voluntary; whereof some would fain be struggling into the light; but I do check their forwardness, because I am afraid they will be borne before their time.—Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 356.

Though I am not fond enough to phancy any art or ornament in the composure to recommend it; yet I know the essay is seasonable, and contains thinges which relate to our biggest interests.—Glanvill. Witchcraft, Epis. Ded.

As he that useth a prayer composed by another, prayeth; and that according to the spirit of him who composed it: so he that praiseth God with these spiritual and prophetical composures may be said to prophesy according to that spirit which speaketh in him.—Mede. Works, b. i. Dis. 16.

So perfectly celestial was that fire
Bestow'd in the composure of his mind,
To that high pitch as raised his desire
Above the usual compass of his kind.

Drayton. The Legend of Robt. D. of Normandy.

But now 'tis done, O let me know
Where these immortal colours grow,
That could this deathless piece compose?
In lines? or the fading rose?—Waller. To Vandyke.

But the last means he contrived for the composing [of] these differences, was, that if they could not make them up by themselves, then to refer the matter to the judgment of some chosen men.—Strype. Memorials, an. 1555.

And it is no easie matter to keep our minds composed and fit to converse with God in prayer, and other solemn duties of religion.—Stillingfleet, vol. iv. Ser. 3.

I concluded that he, who could hear and speak of it often, in the course of the trial, so sedately and composedly, only as a matter of fact, or a note of chronology; or as he might have done of Harlequin's broken leg; could never have received any stop from the thing itself in any of his great designs, but only what common decency required for his own sake.—Hoadly. Letters signed Britannicus, Let. 51.

All philosophers have agreed in this, that inward serenity and composedness of mind is the proper reward of moral virtue.—Wilkins. Natural Religion, b. ii. c. 7.

Ye shady woods where once I us'd to rove,
Alike indulgent to the muse and love.
Ye murmuring streams that in meanders roll,
The sweet composers of the pensive soul!
Farewell. Gay. The Fan.

By his [Wolsey's] preferment, all differences among Christian princes would be in such a fair way of composition, that they might be at leisure to undertake one of the greatest and most notable expeditions against the Turks.

Strype. Memorials. Hen. VIII. an. 1530.

A very proud, or a very suspicious temper; false wit, or a melancholy, and these are the chief and prevailing ingredients in the composition of that man, whom we call a scorner.

Atterbury, vol. iii. Ser. 3.

Each feature, emulous of pleasing most,
Does justly some peculiar sweetness boast;
And her composure's of so fine a frame,
Pride cannot hope to mend, nor envy blame.

Pomfret. Strephon's Love for Delia.

We generally, I fear, consult the Scriptures too negligently, and reflect on them too superficially, with no greater degree of attention and care, than we employ in perusing mere human composures.—Atterbury, vol. iii. Ser. 2.

A long and bloody war, that had well nigh exhausted the strength and vitals of this country, was at length composed by the fortunate successes of Bosworth-field.

Hurd. On the English Government, Dial. 3.

The composer will do well to have an eye to these distinctions, as mere description, or the introductory narrative will admit of a different kind of recitative from the conversation part.—Jago. To the Composer.

In this we shall follow the order, that we have above laid down, first dividing speech, as a whole, into its constituent parts; then resolving it as a composite, into its matter and form.—Harris. Hermes, b. i. c. 1.

For the name of poem will belong to every composition whose primary end is to please, provided it be so constructed as to admit all the pleasure, which its kind or sort will permit.—Hurd. On the Idea of Universal Poetry

The cloth was of the same materials as that which is worn in the other islands, and most of that which was seen by our people was dyed of a bright but deep yellow, and covered on the outside with a composition like varnish, which was rather red or of a dark lead colour.

Cook. Voyage, vol. i. b. i. c. 20.

The jailer, struck with the composure of the apostle, in a moment of such alarm, and with the dignified manner in which he spoke, seems to have felt that instantaneous conviction, which hardened sinners sometimes feel.

Gilpin, vol. i. Ser. 10.

COMPO'SSIBLE. Consisting of united possibilities; of parts, each of which can or may be.

But they which are unwilling to believe nonsence themselves, or persuade others to do so, it is but reason they should make the faith wherewith they believe, an intelligible, compossible, consistent thing, and not define it by repugnances.—Chillingworth. Rel. Prot. pt. i. c. 6.

CO'MPOST, v. Co'MPOST, n. Co'MPOST, adj. COMPO'STURE. } Composed, Compos'd, Compost, past part. of the verb Compose. See COMPOSE. To put, place or set together; to combine or mix.

Than al the princely youth, and temple preest from the altar barres
Contending bring their meates, entrayels of bulls, and seruice rost,
And bread in basketts lade, and wynes they skinke with cakes compost.—Phaer. Virgill. Æneidos, b. viii.

Finding the most pleasurable sin such a sad γλυκυπικρον, compost of more bitter than sweet at the very instant, we should never be such blind votaries of Satan as to go on in such chargeable ways of sin.

Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 534.

——— In every thing compost
Each part of th' essence its entirety
Keeps to itself, it shrinks not to a nullity.

More. Song of the Soul, pt. ii. b. iii. c. 2.

And it seems it hath been taken indifferently, whether you call them the one or the other, both for similitude of delineaments and composture.—Drayton. Polyolb. s. 11. N.

Plants for want of culture, degenerate to be baser in the same kind. Removing into worse earth, or forbearing to compost the earth maketh them degenerate.

Bacon. Nat. Hist. s. 518.

Of compota shall the Muse descend to sing,
Nor soil her heavenly plumes? The sacred Muse
Naught sordid deems, but what is base, nought fair
Unless true virtue stamp it with her seal

Grainger. Sugar Cane, b. i.

It was made in order to give a colour to an exorbitant increase of the civil list, and in the same act to bring a new accession to the loaded compost heap of corrupt influence.

Burke. On Economical Reform.

COMPOTA'TION. } Gr. Συμποσιον; Lat. Co'MPOTATOR, } Compotatio, (con, and potare,) potatum, to drink. Gr. Πινω, the obsolete theme of πωσω.

A drinking together.

Which feasts convivial meetings we did name:
Not like the ancient Greeks, who, to their shame,
Call'd it a compotation, not a feast,
Declaring the worst part of it the best.

Denham. Old Age, pt. ii.

And is also tolerable, if by desiring a secrecy in words spoke under the rose, we only meane in societs and compotations, from the ancient custom in sympostick meetings, to wear chaplets of roses about their heads: and so we condemn not the Germane custom, which over the table describeth a rose in the ceiling.—Brown. Vul. Err. b. v. c. 21.

——— If thou wilt prolong
Dire compotation, forthwith reason quits
Her empire to confusion, and misrule,
And vain debates. J. Philips. Cider, b. ii.

I shall yet think it a diminution to my happiness, to miss of half our companions and compotators of syllabub, &c.

Pope. Letter to Mr. Knight.

In the latter [the Greek] they are called by a word which signifies compotations, whereas, in ours, [the Latin] they are more emphatically styled convivial meetings, intimating that it is in a communication of this nature that life is most truly enjoyed.—Melmoth. Cicero, b. xiii. Let. 9.

COMPO'UND, v. Co'MPOUND, n. Co'MPOUND, adj. COMPO'UNDED. COMPO'UNDER. COMPO'UNDING, n. } Lat. Componere, to put, place, or set together. See COMPONE and COMPOSE. To put, place, or set together, (sc.) In order, form, or method; and thus, to arrange, settle, or adjust; also, to put together, in union or conjunction; and thus, to combine, mix, or mingle. And, generally,—

To come to an arrangement, settlement or adjustment.

Drant. Horace, b. ii. Sat. 4

For if the bishops were diuided among themselues, & at variance, and had no superiour—who should compounde the controuersies?—Whitgift. Defence, p. 364.

——— Therein he found
Fountains of gold and silver to abound,
Of which the matter of his huge desire
And pompous pride eftsoones he did compound

Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. ii. c. 7.

O if, I say, you look upon this verse
When I perhaps compounded am with clay,
Do not so much as my poor name rehearse,
But let your love even with my life decay.
Shakespeare, Son. 71.

The last is the compounded order. His name being a brief of his nature. For this pillar is nothing in effect, but a medly, or an amasse of all the precedent ornaments, making a new kind, by stealth.—Bp. Hall's Hard Texts, p. 25.

Mahometans are a compound of Gentiles, Jewes, and Christians, and so absurd in their ceremonies, as if they had taken that which is most sottish out of every one of them.
Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 670.

But the opinion of Buchanan is more probable that the town now called Dundy is a compound word of Down and Tay.—Spotswood. Church of Scotland, an. 1188.

Fitzjames, Dean of Wells, was adorned with the degree of B A., wearing then the gown and habit of a commounder; that is, one who compounds, or pays double or treble fees for his degree, which is usually done by rich dignitaries.
Wood. Fasti, an. 1544.

In like manner, if, by knowing that colours are nothing else but various mixtures of light and of darkness in bodies, our discourse assures us, that, by several compoundings of these extreams, reds, blews, yellows, greens, and all other intermediate colours may be generated.
Digby. Of Man's Soul, c. 3.

Perceives the crowd's unstable zeal decay,
Lest their recanting chief the cause betray,
Who on a Father's grace his hopes may ground,
And for his pardon with their heads compound.
Dryden. Absalom & Achitophel.

Our holiest actions have been
Th' effects of wickedness and sin;
Religious houses made compounders,
For th' horrid actions of their founders.
Butler. The Weakness and Misery of Man.

There was likeness enough in the features of each manner, to favour Lucian's attempt in compounding his new dialogue.
Hurd. Preface to the Manner of writing Dialogues.

It [Priscillianism] was a monstrous compound of the grossest and lothest errors, collecting into itself all the stinking odour dispersed throughout other heresies.
Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History.

They seem rather such as ought to be expected from those grand compounders in politicks, who shorten the road to their degrees in the state, and have a certain inward fanatical assurance and illumination upon all subjects.
Burke. On the French Revolution.

COMPREHE'ND, v. } Fr. Comprendre; It. Comprendere; Sp. Comprehender; Lat. Comprehendere, — simul capere; com, pre, and hendere, (which (hendere) the Lat. has only in composition; and Tooke supposes to be) from the A. S. Hentan, capere, to take hold of.

To take within, to hold within, to contain, to embrace, to enclose, to grasp.

(Met.) To take within the mind; to conceive; to grasp or embrace within the powers of the understanding; and thus, to understand.

See To Apprehend, To Comprise, and Prise.

Not that now I have taken, or now am perfyt, but I sue if I may in any maner I comprehende in which thing also I am comprehended of Crist Iesus. Brethren, I deme me not that I have comprehendid but oo thing.—Wiclif. Filipensis, c. 3.

Of sondry doutes thus they jangle and trete,
As lewed peple demen comunly
Of thinges that ben made more subtilly
Than they can in hir lewednesse comprehend,
They demen gladly to the badder ende.
Chaucer. The Squieres Tale, v. 10,537.

For heaué he measureth wyth his spanne, and the whole worlde he comprehendeth under his thre fingers.
Bale. Image, pt. I.

Finally soo large is the compase of that, whiche is named historie, that it comprehendeth all thynge that is necessarye to be put in memory.—Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. iii. c. 24.

For God is as myghtie in the stable as in the temple. And as he is not comprehensible nor circumscribed no where; so is he present euery where.
Sir T. More. Workes, p. 121.

To the intent that his inconstant, disloyal and dishonourable demeanure, being to theym perfitely knowen, they may order theym self unto hym, as wel according to the article of their comprehension, contayned in the said treatie of London as by their letters patent accepted, as, &c.
Strype. Rec. No. 23. Instruct. by the King for Mr. Pace.

The virtues required in the heroic poem (and indeed in all writings published) are comprehended all in this one word, Discretion.—Howes. Virtues for an Heroic Poem.

I see what crosses my attempt will bring;
I know what thorns the growing rose defends
I think the honey guarded with a sting;
All this, beforehand, counsel comprehends:
But will is deaf, and hears no heedful friends.
Shakespeare. Rape of Lucrece.

Truth is bigger than our minds, and we are not the same with it, but have a lower participation, only of the intellectual nature, and are rather apprehenders than comprehenders thereof.—Cudworth. Intellectual System, b. I. c. 5.

But after that, Plato was offended with them, and maintained against them, that they did utterly corrupt and disgrace the worthiness and excellency of geometry, making it to descend from things not comprehensible, and without body, unto things sensible and materiall.
North. Plutarch, p. 261.

D. Potter in this very place hath subjoyned, though not a catalogue of fundamentals, yet such a comprehension of them as may serve every one that will make a conscionable use of it instead of a catalogue.
Chillingworth. Relig. of Protest. Church, pt. I. c. 4.

If in the measures of life and death which are described in large characters, there be any lines so indefinite, and comprehensive, that they who preach and declare the doctrines, do not fully take in all that God intends, upon the account of our weakness and ignorance, there may be some little rushes and twigs to support their sinking hopes.
Bp. Taylor. On Repentance, c. 3. s. 6.

As pictures represent but the outward lineaments, so this but the letter of the law; not the law itself comprehensively taken, but τα των νομων, some things about the law, outward acts.—Goodwin. Works, vol. iii. pt. I. p. 90.

There are these three senses and interpretations of it; and I love to take (especially where there is a comprehensiveness, as here there is of all) all in.—Id. Ib. vol. I. pt. I. p. 136.

When I have the word of a God, for my assurance, farewell reason, and welcome faith; as when I shall have dispatcht this weary pilgrimage, and from a traveller shall come to be a comprehensor, farewell faith, and welcome vision.
Bp. Hall. Satan's Fiery Darts, Dec. 1.

This is life eternal, says he, to know thee the only true God; and him whom thou hast sent, Jesus Christ, that is, to be rightly instructed in the knowledge of the only true God, and of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord? Under which two general heads are comprehended all the necessary principles both of the natural and of the Christian religion.
Tillotson, vol. I. Ser. 34.

And how much soever any truths may seem above our understanding and comprehension, yet if they come attested by his divine infallible authority, we have infinitely more ground to be persuaded of them than we are of any thing that we ourselves may seem to comprehend or understand.
Beveridge, vol. I. Ser. 34.

'Tis chicanery in the word: a free-thinker, in this self-evident proposition, is any man that uses his understanding, that is, that thinks at all: a very comprehensive definition.
Bentley. Of Free-Thinking.

And here I shall not restrain righteousness to the particular virtue of justice but enlarge it according to the genius and straine of the book of the Proverbs, in which the words wisdom and righteousness are commonly used very comprehensively so as to signify all religion and virtue.
Tillotson, vol. I. Ser. 3.

Though it be an ordinary saying among us, do as you would be done by, yet I fear it is not so generally and truly understood as it ought to be, nor so easy to be explain'd, as it may seem at first sight by reason of its extent and comprehensiveness.—Beveridge, vol. ii. Ser. 129.

Lastly, though St. Paul were an excellent apostle, yet he was still but a man, and a man on earth not yet in heaven, a viator, not a comprehensor, or a proficient, not yet fully perfect, or so immutably confirmed in virtue as to be out of all danger of the sin of pride, which even the angels of heaven fell into.—Bp. Bull, vol. I. Ser. 5.

Alas! by different steps and ways
Our modern critics aim at praise,
And rashly in the learned arts,
They judge by prejudice and parts,
For crampt by a contracted soul,
How should they comprehend the whole!—Smart, Fab. 1.

But no figure I think more beautifully and more comprehensively describes it [life] than that of a journey, to which it is compared by the apostle in the text.—Gilpin, vol. I. Ser. 8.

Whether then composed or only applied, thus much must be admitted, that in learning, sense, energy, and comprehensiveness, it is fully equal to all the modern dissertations on the equality of mankind, and it has one advantage over them,—that it is in rhyme.
Burke. Appeal from the New to the Old Whigs.

COMPRESBYTE'RIAL, adj. Com, and presbyterial, (qv.) from Gr. Πρεσβυς, senex, an elder.

He that, enabled with gifts from God, and the lawful and primitive choice of the church assembled in convenient number, faithfully from that time forward feeds his parochial flock, has his coequal and compresbyterial power to ordain ministers and deacons by publick prayer, and vote of Christ's congregation in like sort as he himself was ord'in'd, and is a true apostolick bishop.—Milton. Reform. in England, b. I.

COMPRE'SS, v. } Sp. Comprimir, compression; It. Comprimere; Fr. Comprimer; Lat. Comprimere, compressum, (con, and premere,) which, Vossius thinks, may be from Gr. Βαρυμα, pondus; because premere, as Perottus says, is properly to lean against any thing cum pondere. See To Press.

COMPRESSIBI'LITY.
COMPRE'SSION.
COMPRE'SSIVE.
COMPRE'SSURE.

To press two or more bodies together, seems always to imply that the bodies are in contact before the act of pressing commences. To compress is, as the—

Fr. Comprimer,—to press, to squeeze, to thrust, close or strain together, (Cotgrave.)

To press,—implies that the motion or action is from the agent; to pull,—that it is to or towards the agent.

The bashfull maide, as she went vp, into the higher roome
The warre-god secretly compressd.
Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. II.

For shall we say he [the Devil] caused sometimes thunders, lightnings, and tempests; and can inflict the air, as well as move it or compress it; who knows not that these things are also natural?
Raleigh. History of the World, b. I. c. 2. s. 7.

For, although this solution of continuity may seem to be a dilation, yet in truth it is a compression in the part where the evil is; which happens to it in the same manner as we shew'd (when we spoke of the motion of restitution) it doth to stiff bodies, that by violence are compress'd and drawn into a less capacious figure, than their nature affects; and return into their own state, as soon as the mastring violence leaves them at liberty.—Digby. Of Bodies, c. 35.

Considering the brushiness and angulosity of the parts of the air, a more than ordinary motion or compressive rest may very well prove painful to the soul, and disharmonious to her touch.—More. Immortality of the Soul, b. iii. c. 1.

According as the superficies of the same body is better or worse disposed to reflection of light, by polishing, or by compressure together, or the like; so, the same body remaining the same in substance, will show it self of a different colour.
Digby. Of Bodies, c. 29.

We may compare the soul to a force, which has at one and the same time a tendency many ways, but acts on that part only where it finds the greatest ease, or the least resistance. For example: Air strongly compressed in a glass receiver, will break the glass to get out. It presses upon every part, but at last makes its way where the glass is weakest.
Clarke. Leibnitz Appendix, No. 3.

Perhaps, it will not be necessary to conclude that the air is so much more rarefiable than compressible, as most readers will be prone to infer, by comparing the greatest compression and expansion of it that are mentioned in these experiments.
Boyle. Works, vol. iii. p. 508.

And yet our experiment will be a considerable instance of the great compressibility, if I may so speak of the air.
Id. Ib. vol. iii. p. 507.

The same strength of expression, though more compressed, runs through his historical harangues, which so eminently distinguishes and adorns his public orations.
Melmoth. Pliny, b. I. Let. 16.

They who can form parallels, discover consequences, and multiply conclusions, are best pleased with involution of argument and compression of thought; they desire only to receive the seeds of knowledge, which they may branch out by their own powers, to have the way of truth pointed out, which they can then follow without a guide.—Idler, No. 70.

COMPRIEST. Lat. Con, and priest.
A fellow priest.

What will he then praise them for? not for any thing doing, but for deferring to do, for deferring to chastise his lewd and insolent compriests.
Milton. An Apology for Smectymnuus.

In her wisht comfort. Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. vi.

I observed to you, that all four might be comprized in this one general proposition, viz. that it is required of Christians, who have been wilful sinners, sincerely to endeavour for the future to practice the whole will of God, any ways made known to them; and that, without this amendment, and sincere, universal obedience, the gospel gives them no ground of hopes of pardon and acceptance, and eternal life.

Hoadly. Works, vol. iii. Ser. 4.

It [slander] is a complication, a comprisal, a collection and summe of all wickedness.—Barrow, vol. i. Ser. 18.

Whatever was by them decreed, either in the declaration of Christian belief, or refutation of heresy, may all be comprised, as judicious Hooker well noteth, in four words, "truly, perfectly, indivisibly, distinctly," truly God, perfectly man, indivisibly one person, distinctly two natures.

Bp. Horne. Works, vol. iv. Dis. 7.

CO'MPROMISE, n.
COMPROMI'SSION.
CO'MPROMIT, v.

explains the Fr. noun, Compromis; "a mutual promise of adversaries to refer their differences unto arbitrement." To compromise is, also—

To arrange, adjust, or settle, without the intervention of arbiters; usually attended with mutual concessions.

Antenor would haue compromize
to cut awaye the same.—Drant. Horace Ep. to Lollius.

Also I do send herewith in French, how King Edward the First was received and taken to be supream Lord in Scotland, by all those that pretended title to the crown of Scotland, as next heirs to the king, that was then dead without issue, and the compromise of them all made unto the said King Edward the First to stand to his judgment, which of all them that did claim should have the Crown of Scotland.

The controversie may easily be compromized by this distinction.—Fuller. General Worthies, c. 6.

Yet by mediation of his friends, the matter came to a compromise, and the land to be divided betwixt the father and sonne, but with such partiality that the better part westward was allotted to Ethelbald.

Speed. Ethelwolfe, an. 838.

For there being so many ways of making great sins little, and little sins none at all, found out by the folly of men and the craft of the devil, a great portion of God's right, and the duty we owe to him, is by way of compromise and agreement left as a portion to carelessness and folly.

Bp. Taylor. On Repentance, c. 3. s. 4.

For Christians to prosecute one another before the tribunals of infidels, for those injuries, which they might fairly compromise by the arbitration and decision of persons of their own body, was a thing that reflected an high disgrace, and left a great scandal on the Christian religion.

South, vol. x. Ser. 8.

The circumstances to which you are reduced, will not admit of a compromise with the English nation.

Junius, Let. 35.

Iren. Sure Eudox. The evils which you desire to be recounted are very many, and almost countable with those which were hidden in the basket of Pandora

Spenser. On Ireland, vol. viii. p. 300.

Nature itself cannot err: and as men abound in copiousness of language; so they become more wise or more mad than ordinary. For words are wise men's counters, they do but reckon by them: but they are the money of fools, that value them by authority of an Aristotle, a Cicero, or a Thomas, or any other doctor whatsoever, if but a man.

Hobbs. Of Man, pt i.

But, oh! her mind, that Orcus, which includes

COMPU'NCT, v. } Fr. Compunction; It. Compugnere, compuntione; Sp. Compungir, compuncion; Lat. Compungere, ctum, (con, and pungere,) to prick. Laterum compunctiones, in Pliny, (xxi. 19,) is rendered by
COMPU'NCTED, adj.
COMPU'NCTION.
COMPU'NCTIOUS.
COMPU'NCTIVE.

Holland, "The stitches of the side." In English, Compunct, the verb, is out of use. Compunction, (met.) is applied to—

The stings, stitches, or pricks of conscience; to the pangs attending guilt, or the recollection of guilt; remorse, contrition. And see the example from Mede.

Whanne thei herden these thingis thei weren compunct in herte, and thei seiden to Petir and to othire apostles, britheren, what shulen we don?—Wiclif. Dedis, c. 2.

God ghaf to him a spyryt of compunccioun, ighen that thei se not, and eeris that thei heere not into this dai.
Id. Romaynes, c. 11.

And contrarywise they whom it behoued moste of all to vnderstand, that these thynges wer promysed by the holy sayynges of the prophetes, and who also seemed to be ye very pillours of al deuout holines, haue vtterly refused the bounteous goodnes of God, beyng offred vnto them, and haue felt no maner compunccion, to repentaunce or amendment, neither at John's preachyng, nor yet at mine.
Udal. Luke, c. 7.

The Englishman's custome was, that he that should be consecrated to lawfull warfare, should the euening before the day of his consecration, to some bishoppe, abbott, monke, or priest, contrite and compunct, make confession of his sinnes, and absolued, should continue all night in the church, and giue himselfe to prayers, deuotions, and afflictions.—Stow. William the Conqueror, an. 1086.

The king [Edgar] terrified with these thundering words of Dunstan and compuncted with inward repentance of his sinne perpetrated, fell downe with weeping at the feet of Dunstan.—Fox. Martyrs, p. 111.

But he being greatly compuncted and troubled in his conscience for disembling with the truth and called afterwarde before the lord chief iudge answered so directly, that he was condemned for the same, and burned in Prouince.
Id. Ib. p 825.

But shame forbids me for to tell the rest,
It me abhors to shew what did ensue:
And yet because it moueth in my breast
Compunction still, and was God wot too true,
I'll farther tell whence my destruction grue.
Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 51.

Compunction is a turning in the affections and passions of the mind; and that not one passion only, but of every passion wherewith we abhor and flye a thing vsefull; as fear, grief and hate; for we must turn with our whole hearts.
Mede. Works, b. i. Dis. 25.

Stop vp th' accesse, and passage to remorse,
That no compunctious visitings of nature
Shake my fell purpose, nor keepe peace betweene
Th' effect, and it.—Shakespeare. Macbeth, Act i. sc. 5.

O give me all faith, and all charity, and a spirit highly compunctive, highly industrious, passionate, prudent, and indefatigable in holy services.
Bp. Taylor. On Repentance. A Prayer, c. 5. s. 6.

Repentance, extorted from us by the prospect of death, can be only a sorrow for sin; perhaps rendered more passionate by our present fears. And this being only sorrow, and compunction, and perhaps a good resolution; it is plain that still these are only the steps in the repentance of a sinner: and not complete repentance, in all its parts.
Hoadly. Works, vol. iii. Ser. 15.

Add to all this the compunction, which such a man feels, when he is obliged to discountenance in others, perhaps, by his station, to punish, those crimes in which he had so long and so freely indulged himself: and how uneasy the very discharge of his duty is thus rendered to him.
Hurd. Works, vol. vi. Ser. 27.

COMPU'PIL, n. Lat. Con, pupillus a pupus, hoc est, puer, (Vossius,)
A fellow pupil.

Donne, and his sometime compupil in Cambridge, that married him, namely, Samuel Brook.
Walton. Life of Donne.

COMPURGA'TION, n. } Lat. Compurgare,
COMPURGA'TOR. } atum, (con, and purgare,) to cleanse; It. Compurgatore; Sp. Compurgar, compurgador. See the example from Priestley; and, under Co-JURATION, the form of the oath.

"Fr. Compurgateur,—one who by oath justifies the (innocency) report or oath of another," (Cotgrave.)

He putteth him to no farther busines at al, but also yf it be not so fully cleared, but that there remaine some tokens of suspicion, of whiche he think it good to purge him by the othe of himself & some other compurgatours with him, he putteth him after the purgation vnto no penaunce neither.
Sir T. More. Workes, p. 986.

In the same day and place, did Margery Bowgas also purge herself with diuers compurgators.—Strype. Mem. an. 1527.

Neither doubt I but all they who know me, and amongst them many persons of place and quality, will say they have reason in this matter to be my compurgators.
Chillingworth. Rel. of Prot. Pref.

The oath of purgation was substituted in the place of battle, the defendant bringing along with him into the court certain persons called compurgators, who after he had sworn to his own innocence, all swore that his oath was true.—Lastly, the oath of compurgation gave place to juries.

So great hase and fogge did hang vpon the coast, as neither we mighte discerne the land well, nor take the sun's height, but by our best computation we were then in the fifty one degrees of latitude.—Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. iii. p. 140.

Wherevpon some haue been so bold as to tell vs, that the yeares Moses there speakes of, are not to be computed as ours, but were somewhat aboue the monethly yeare containing in them thirty-six dayes which is a number quadrate, being made vp of six times six.
Hakewill. Apologie, p. 156.

Thirdly; the compute may be unjust not only in the strict acception, of a few daies or hours, but in the latitude also of some years, and this may happen from the different compute of years in divers nations, and even such as did maintain the most probable way of account.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iv. c. 12.

For mine own part, I am not at all affraid to be called to so strict an account, and do not doubt but that I shall be gainer upon the whole compute.
More. Appendix to the Defence, c. 3.

Now it is manifest, and most men likewise know, that the calenders of these computers, and the accounts of these dayes are very different, the Greeks dissenting from the Latines, and the Latines from each other.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. vi. c. 6.

Thus while we conceive we have the account of a year in 365 days, exact enquirers and computists will tell us, that we escape six houres, that is a quarter of a day.
Id. Ib. b. vi. c. 8.

Our forefathers attaining unto 8 or 900 yeares, had not their climacters computable by digits, or as we do account them.—Id. Ib. b. iv. c. 12.

Now to the end that the computation of the times to come, might from the new kalends of Januarie agree the better, betweene November and December, he put two other moneths. So as, that yeare wherein all this was ordained, had fifteen moneths, reckoning the ordinarie interlaced moneth, which by course and custome fell just upon the said yeare.—Holland. Suetonius, p. 17.

And to an inch compute the station
'Twixt judgment and imagination.—Prior. Alma, c. 3.

According to the observations of Mersennus, a bullet shot out of a great gun, flies ninety-two fathoms in a second of time, which is equal to 589½ feet English: and according to the computation of Mr. Huygens, it would be twenty-five years in passing from the earth to the sun.
Derham. Physico-Theology, b. i. c. 4. n. 4.

In which case his [Childers] fleetness is to that of the swiftest barb, as four to three: the former, according to Dr. Maty's computation, covering at every bound a space of ground equal in length to twenty-three feet royal,—the latter only that of eighteen feet and a half royal.
Pennant. British Zoology. The Horse.

COMRADE. Sp. Camerada; It. Camerata; Fr. Camerade; "A camerade, or chamber-fellow; a company that belongs to, or is ever lodged in, one chamber, tent, or cabin," (Cotgrave.) From Camera, a chamber; Gr. Καμαρα, tectum arcuatum. Generally a camerade or comrade, is—

A companion or associate, a fellow, (sc.) servant, soldier, &c.

Then make provision for your slavering hounds,
When you come drunk from an alehouse, after hunting,
With your clowns and comrades, as if all were yours,
You the lord paramount, and I the drudge.
Massinger. The City Madam, Act ii. sc. 2.

These are the particular idioms and graceful confidences now in use; introduced, I conceive, at first by some camerades one with another: but is mean and rude.
Evelyn. Character of England.

He doth affirm of his own experience, that trying this feat upon some of his comerades when he was young, one that had gormundized much beef upon taking the potion, strongly imagined himself to be surrounded with bulls, that would be ever and anon running upon him with their horns.
More. Of Enthusiasm, s. 9.

Now shaves with level wings the deep, then soars
Up to the fiery concave tow'ring high.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. ii.

From off a hill, whose concave womb re-worded
A plaintful story from a sistering vale,
My spirits to attend this double voice accorded,
And down I lay to list the sad-tun'd tale.
Shakespeare. A Lover's Complaint.

The element of water being of a liquid and flowing nature, ran downward to hollow places lying low, which were able to receive and hold them, or else the water of it selfe where it stayed and rested made concavities and hollow places underneath.—Holland. Plutarch, p. 662.

Yet the dolphin that carrieth Arion is concavously inverted, and hath its spine depressed
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. v. c. 2.

Look upon the outside of a dome, your eye half surrounds it, look up into the inside, and at one glance you have all the prospect of it, the entire concavity falls into your eye at once.—Spectator, No. 315.

The concavous part of the liver was called aversa, i. e. belonging to the family, because the signs observed there concerned themselves and their friends.
Potter. Antiquities of Greece, b. ii. c. 14.

CO'NCAUSE, s. A cause acting in unison with another cause. See CAUSE.

The power of all these he ascribes unto the efficient, making it in effect the only true cause of all the rest; and all the rest to be rather as instruments unto it, than concauses with it.—Fotherby. Atheom. p. 223.

So of concealed sorrow may be said.
Shakespeare. Venus & Adonis.

For returning a lie unto his Maker, and presuming in this manner to put off the Searcher of hearts, he [Cain] denied the omniscency of God, whereunto there is nothing concealable.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. i. c. 2.

Fifthly, That they [demons] knew all secret things, whether hidden books or monies: which men doe too, if they could stand by concealedly from them that hide them.
More. Immortality of the Soul, b. iii. c. 17.

And when as the consul had propounded rewards to them that would tell him of them, and punishments to the concealers; he took it ill that none were discovered, as if the army did defend them —Usher. Annals, an. 3961.

All ingenious concealings, or amendings, of what is originally or casually amiss, or seems so, in our bodies and outsides.—Bp. Taylor. Artificial Handsomeness, p. 163.

The next ground, upon which such as are wont to promise themselves security, both from the discovery and punishment of their sins, is the opinion which they have of their own singular art and cunning to conceal them from the knowledge; or, at least, of their power to rescue them from the jurisdiction of any earthly judge.—South, vol. iv. Ser. 4.

O! where where is my sweet brother? (For she [Ann Boleyn] feared the king's displeasure against her would reach unto all her relations.) Kyngston replyed I left him at York Place thinking it convenient to conceal it from her, though he was committed the same day.
Strype. Memorials. Hen. VIII. an. 1536.

Some to the rude protection of the thorn

This imagery and representation of the qualities of the things without, is that we call our conception, imagination, sense, notice or knowledge of them; and the faculty or power by which we are capable of such knowledge, is that I here call cognitive power or conceptive, the power of knowing or conceiving.—Hobbs. Human Nature, c. 1.

By sight, we have a conception or image composed of colour and figure, which is all the notice and knowledge the object imparteth to us of its nature by the eye. By hearing, we have a conception called sound, which is all the knowledge we have of the quality of the object from the ear. And so the rest of the senses are also conceptions of several qualities or natures of their objects.—Id. Ib. c. 2.

All evidence is conception and all conception is imagination, and proceedeth from sense. And spirits we suppose to be those substances which work not upon the sense; and therefore not conceptible.—Id. Ib. c. 11.

Where there is more of light, there is more of visibility, so where there is more of entity, reality, and perfection, there is there more of conceptibility and cognoscibility.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, p. 609.

Shakespeare. Timon of Athens, Act iv. s. 3.

He is of opinion that by the coldness hereof they may be reduced into a conceptive constitution.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. vii. c. 7.

A man reconciled to the profession of popery, upon the principles of atheism, or a total disbelief of a God or a future state, this I can also conceive, because, I fear, it is too often seen and felt.—Hoadley. Letters signed Britannicus, Let. 62.

A man, turned from popery to deism, and sometimes to atheism, by such a way of representing the gospel, as a dispensation of light perfected by darkness; as requiring an annihilation of our understanding, and all our ideas; joyned with the unhappiness of living where no other gospel is preached or heard of; This again is conceivable: and I wish, I could not say, to the grief of all good men, too natural and frequent.—Id. Ib.

Such mistaken subtelties arise out of our unwary conceiting that things are in their own natures after the same fashion as we consider them in our understanding.
Digby. Of Bodies, c. 1.

That groom, that conceited himself an emperour, thought all as irrational as disloyal, that did not acknowledge him.
Glanvill. Vanity of Dogmatizing, c. 11.

If any of you entertain such conceits as these, I confess you are a great deal more righteous than I thought you had been.—Chillingworth, Ser. 9.

[Tasso] is full of conceipts, points of epigram and witticisms; all which are not only below the dignity of heroic verse, but contrary to its nature: Virgil and Homer have not one of them.—Dryden. On Origin & Progress of Satire.

As arrogance, and conceitedness of our own abilities are very shocking and offensive to men of sense and virtue, we may be sure they are highly displeasing to that Being, who delights in an humble mind, and by several of his dispensations seems purposely to shew us, that our own schemes or prudence, have no share in our advancement.
Spectator, No. 293.

Well, I will never more complain,
Or call the fates unkind;
Alas! how fond it is, how vain!
But self-conceitedness does reign
In every mortal mind. Prior, s. 34.

For heat and moisture when in bodies join'd,
The temper that results from either kind
Conception makes; and fighting, till they mix,
Their mingled atoms in each other fix.
Dryden. Ovid. Met. b. i.

It was among the ruins of the Capitol that I first conceived the idea of a work which has amused and exercised near twenty years of my life; and which, however inadequate to my own wishes, I finally deliver to the curiosity and candour of the public.—Gibbon. Roman Empire, c. 71.

It is even very conceivable, that, if God be the dispenser of prophesy, and not man; all that seems great and illustrious in human affairs may to his all-judging eye appear small and contemptible; and, on the other hand, what we account as nothing, may for infinite reasons, unknown to us, but so far as he is pleased to discover them, be of that importance as to merit the attention of all his prophets from the foundation of the world.—Hurd. Works, vol. v. S. 1.

The lord of the mansion most rightly conceiting,
His guests lov'd good prayers much less than good eating.
P. Whitehead. On converting the Chapel to a Kitchen.

Plum'd with conceit he calls aloud.
And thus bespeaks the purblind crowd;
"Say not, that man alone's a poet.
Poets are owls—my verse shall show it."—Cotton. Fable.

But a religion, whose object was the truth, was at this time so unknown a thing, that a Pagan magistrate could have no conception of it, but as a new sect of philosophy.
Warburton. Works, vol. ix. Ser. 1.

In the very slight sketch which I have given of the controversy between the Nominalists and the Realists about the existence of Universals, I have taken no notice of an intermediate sect, called the Conceptualists; whose distinguishing tenet is said to have been, that the mind has a power of forming general conceptions.

To sing together in union, in harmony, in concord.

Or such as that celestiall Psalmist was,
That when the wicked fiend his lord tormented,
With heavenly notes that did all other pass,
The outrage of his furious fit relented.
Such musick is wise words with time concented,
To moderate stile musicks, dispos'd to striue.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. iv. c. 2.

A dreadfull thunder-clap at last he heard,
The aged trees and plants well nigh that rent;
Yet heard the nymphs and syrens afterward,
Birds, winds, and waters, sing with sweet concent.
Fairefax. Godfrey of Bovlogne, b. xviii. s. 19.

With that, a ioyous fellowship issew'd
Of minstrals, making goodly meriment,
With wanton bards, and rhymers impudent;
All which together sung full cheerfully
A lay of loue's delight, with sweet concent.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. iii. c. 12.

And to our high-rais'd phantasy present
That undisturbed song of pure concent,
Ay, sung before the saphir-coloured throne
To him that sits thereon,
With saintly shout, and solemn jubilee.
Milton. Odes. At a Solemn Music

When look'd the yeare; at best,

See CENTRE. Fr. Concentre; Gr. Κεντρον, a point, (sc.) in the middle of a sphere, globe or circle; that point from which the circumference is every where equi-distant.

To concentre, is to move, or cause to move, towards the same centre; to meet, or cause to meet, join or unite, in the same centre.

For the bricks, having first been formed in a circular mould, and then cut before their burning into four quarters or more, the sides afterwards join so closely, and the points concentre so exactly, that the pillars appear one entire piece.
Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 28.

For what power of human understanding could have found out the incarnation of a God; that two natures [a finite, and an infinite] could have been concentred into one hypostasis (one person.)—Bp. Taylor, vol. ii. Ser. 1.

We know our places here, wee mingle not
One in another's sphere, but all moue orderly,
In our owne orbes, yet we are all concentricks.
B. Jonson. Staple of News, Act ii. sc. 2.

Those, like so many spheres, but one heaven make,
For they are all concentrise unto thee.
Donne. Love's Growth.

Hence, in the next place, whatsoever perfections or properties (except such as be purely personal) are attributed to any of these divine persons, are the same in all, and may equally be attributed to every one, they being all and every one the same God, in whom all perfections concenter, or rather, who is all perfection itself.—Beveridge, vol. i. Ser. 12.

The event was, that, though the air had been pumped out, the concentred beams of the sun made the aurum fulminans go off, and violently scatter about the cavity of the receiver a yellowish dust or powder.
Boyle. Works, vol. iii. p. 572.

But notwithstanding my care to make my trials in clear weather, when the moon was about the full, and, if I mis-remember not, with a weather-glass, I could not perceive by any concentration of the lunar beams, no not upon a black object, that her light did produce any sensible degree, either of cold or heat.—Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 650.

The yoke itself though we saw no distinct particles of ice in it, was grown so hard, that it cut just like the yoke of an egg over-boiled, and being cut quite through, shewed us certain concentrical circles of somewhat differing colours.
Id. Ib. vol. ii. p. 527.

The sea replenish'd traffics as before,
And back to earth returns the fruitful store,
To earth! for here concentring, air, and fire,
And flood, in mutual triple league conspire.
Brooke. Universal Beauty, b. ii.

Each virtue, in its perfection, is exemplified in its own knight; they are all, in a due degree, concentrated in prince Arthur.—Hurd. Works. Letters on Chivalry, Let. 8.

Gloom and silence produce composure of mind and concentration of ideas; and the privation of external pleasure naturally causes an effort to find entertainment within.

Shakespeare. Hamlet, Act iii. sc. 4.

A man cannot chuse well even in things belonging to this life, without the Divine assistance. And therefore in things of great concernment we pray to God to conduct and direct our choice.—Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. i. c. 1.

For since God will be justified with a free obedience, and there is an obedience of understanding as well as of will and affection, it is of great concernment, as to be willing to believe whatever God says, so also to enquire diligently whether the will of God be so as is pretended.
Id. The Liberty of Prophesying, s. 10.

Whence you may easily gather, that if we mean to copy out our Saviour's example and to be devout as he was, it will concern us to take all opportunities, that our occasions will allow us, of worshipping God in public, and not think it sufficient to say our prayers in private.
Sharp, vol. v. Ser. 3.

So the last sun, while least by us enjoy'd,
Is the whole night for our concerns employ'd,
Her precious spices, fruit, and precious gums,
Which from remotest regions hither comes.
Waller. Upon his Majesty's Happy Return.

Those discourses, together with a little book newly printed at Paris, according to the license of that nation, of the amours of Hen. 4 which was by them presented to him, [were] too concernedly read by him.
Clarendon. Life of Lord, vol. iii. p. 322.

O let us then and there pour out our souls to him with all humility, acknowledging our own vileness, and representing to him our various wants and necessities, and begging a supply of them from his infinite bounty, with as much earnestness and concernedness as an hungry beggar begs alms at our doors.—Sharp, vol. vi. Ser. 11.

Since conscience is nothing else but a man's judgment concerning actions, as good, or bad, or indifferent, it is certain, that a man must have some measures to proceed by, in order to the framing such a judgment about actions, that is to say, there must be something distinct from the man himself, that makes actions to be good, or bad, or indifferent.—Id. vol. ii. A Discourse of Conscience.

God direct and assist us all in so concerning a work, [the sacrament.]—South, vol. ii. Ser. 8.

I made it one of my motives to go into Ireland, and one of my concerningest businesses there, to get this lease assigned over in trust to yourself and Roger Hall.
Boyle. Life. Works, vol. i. p. 53.

But while they are so eager to destroy the fame of others, their ambition is manifest in their concernment; some poem of their own is to be produced, and the slaves are to be laid flat with their faces on the ground, that the monarch may appear in the greater majesty.—Dryden. All for Love, Pref.

It much concerns a preacher first to learn
The genius of his audience, and their turn.
Dodsley. The Art of Preaching.

The fall of a cottage, by the accidents of time and weather, is almost unheeded, while the ruin of a tower which the neighbourhood hath gazed at for ages with admiration, strikes all observers with concern.
Hurd. On the Province of the Drama.

As not taking the true scope of the Æneis, hath occasioned mistakes, to Virgil's disadvantage, concerning the plan and conduct of the poem; so hath it likewise, concerning the characters.—Warburton. The Divine Legation, b. ii. s. 4.

As to the bad indeed, if it [consecration to the service of heaven] does not aggravate their crimes, at least it renders them more scandalous: and, in general, when the matter is of high concernment, the passions both of good and bad are always, from the common importance of our nature, proportionably inflamed.—Id. Works, vol. ix. Ser. 1.

CO'NCERT, or CO'NSORT, v.
CO'NCERT, or CO'NSORT, n.
CONSO'RTABLE.
CONSO'RTER, n.
CONSO'RTION.
CO'NSORTSHIP.

It. Concertare; Sp. Concertar; Fr. Concerter; to consort or agree together. Concert de Musique,—a consort of music, (Cotgrave.) This manner of writing the word (sc. Concert) has been adopted in English from the French, though their etymologists can give no account of its origin. Some think from concentus; some from concertare, because the different persons contend against each other; and some from consertum, because wrought and composed of various sounds. Consort is probably the correct writing, formed from the Lat. Consors. (See ASSORT.)

A consort,—that which is united to share the same lot with another,—as a consort in marriage; a ship's consort,—a comrade, an associate, a companion.

A consort, or concert, in music,—in which a number of persons or instruments, or both, are united in the same performance; unison, harmony.

To consort, or as more commonly written, to concert, is,—to join or unite for the same purpose; to form or unite in the same design or counsel, the same plan, plot, or contrivance; to plan, to contrive; to join or unite in the same company: and, simply, to associate with, to accompany.

In consort of the comune.—Piers Ploughman, p. 79.

All these consorted to goe to Goa together, and I determined to goe with them.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. pt. i. p. 222.

And by these presents do give full power and authority unto you, and three of you, to enquire, &c. of all and every their coadjutors, counsellors, consorters, procurers, abetters, and maintainers.—Burnet. Records, pt. ii. b. ii. No. 32. A Commission, &c. against Hereticks.

There are commonly about 17 or 18 fleete of them, of great large boates, which diuide themselues into diuers companies, five or sixe boates in a consort.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 478.

And the last great voyage of M. Ralph Fitch, who with M. John Newbury and two other consorts departed from London with her maiesties letters written effectually in their fauour to the kings of Cambaia and China in the yere 1583.—Hackluyt, vol. ii. p. 4. Ep. Ded.

Right hard it was for wight which did it heare,
To read what manner musick that mote bee:
For all that pleasing is to liuing eare,
Was there consorted in one harmonee,
Birdes, voices, instruments, windes, waters, all agree.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. ii. c. 12.

Away, thou changeling motley humourist,
Leave me, and in this standing wooden chest,
Consorted with these few books, let me lie
In prison, and here be coffin'd, when I die.
Donne, Sat. 1

——— He with his consorted Eve
The storie heard attentive, and was fill'd
With admiration, and deep muse to heare
Of things so high and strange.—Milton. Par. Lost, b. viii.

——— But man, the abstract
Of all perfection, which the workmanship
Of heaven hath modell'd, in himself contains
Passions of sev'ral qualities; the music
Of man's fair composition best accords
When 'tis in consort, not in single strains.
Ford. The Lover's Melancholy, Act iv. sc. 3

And all the while, sweet birds thereto applie
Their dainty layes and dulcet melody,
Ay caroling of loue and iolitie,
That wonder was to heare their trim consort.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. iii. c. 1.

The lesser brooks as they did bubbling goe,
Did keep a consort to the publike woe.
Drummond. On the Death of Marlindes.

——— For though the foyle were mine,
Conquest brings forth her wreaths by turnes, stay then this last of thine,
But till I arme: and I am made a consort for thee straight,
Or goe I'le overtake thy haste.
Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. vi.

O may we soon again renew that song,
And keep in tune with heav'n, till God ere long
To his celestial concert us unite,
To live with him, and sing in endless morn of light.
Milton. Solemn Music.

Therein I must confess, much more consortable to Charles Brandon under Henry the Eight, who was equal to him in both.—Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 173.

After whom came Uzzia, or Azaria, in the 27 year of Jeroboam, king of Israel, reckoning from the time that he began to reign in consortship with his father, as before, in the year of the world, 3168, was said; and he reigned 52 years in Jerusalem.—Usher. Annals, an. 3194.

But I shall not contend on such deep points as these, let but [pari consortio] signify equal consortship, and I demand no more; for then, they that receive at the same time with him honour and power in equal consortship, will not easily be imagined so unequal, as are that one monarch, and all his subjects.—Hammond. Works, vol. ii. p. 349.

It was concerted to begin the siege in March, for they knew that if they began it so early, our fleet could not come in time to relieve it.—Burnet. Own Time, an. 1706.

Yet there are men, even the bishops and dignitaries not excepted, scandalously addicted to uncleanness, and the loose women they consorted with well known.
Strype. Memorials. Queen Mary, an. 1555.

And while he struggles on the stormy main,
Invokes his father, and his wife, in vain;
But yet his consort is his greater care;
Alcyone he names amidst his prayer,
Names as a charm against the waves, and wind;
Most in his mouth, and ever in his mind.
Dryden. Ovid. Met. Ceyx & Alcyone.

While others are curious in the choise of good air, and chiefly solicitous for healthful habitations, study thou conversation, and be critical in thy consortion.
Brown. Christian Morals, vol. ii. p. 9.

A gentleman who has prepared his way to it by writing and voting, and speaking vehemently, in exact concert with the tone of voice of popular discontents, resolves to shew the strength of the popularity he has attained, in this very spot of ground.—Hoadly. Letters signed Britannicus, Let. 5.

Furious in their adversity, tyrannical in their successes, a commander had more trouble to concert his defence before the people, than to plan the operations of the campaign.
Burke. Vindication of Natural Society.

I am sorry you accepted Lyso's invitation to his concert, least your going abroad so soon should occasion a relapse in the fourth critical week.
Monmouth. Cicero. To Tiro, b. vi. Let. 24.

If he have such a regard, he will naturally desire, not only to consort with those who are like himself, but one should hope, would wish to make all like himself with whom he consorts.—Gilpin, vol. iii. Ser. 10.

Ye towers of Julius, London's lasting shame,
With many a foul and midnight murther fed,
Revere his consort's faith, his father's fame,
And spare the meek usurper's holy head.—Gray. Bard.

CONCERTA'TION. Lat. Concertare, atum, (con, and certare,) to strive or struggle together, to contend with.

After the concertation when they could not agree, the king [Hen. II.] comming betweene them both, called awaie the bishops from the monks, supposing by separating one from the other to draw both parties to his sentence.
Fox. Martyrs, p. 215.

And I find that Christ in his concertations with the carnal Jew, professeth in preaching the Gospel, which seem'd new to them, to witness and preach none other things, than those, which Moses particularly, and the prophets did say.
Goodwin. Works, vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 4.

It is also a rule fetcht from the law of arms and concertations in games or the like; that if a man strive for masteries he is not crowned (and so is not reckoned to overcome) unless he strive lawfully, 2 Tim. ii. 5.
Id. Ib. vol. iii. pt. ii. p. 303.

CONCH, n. Fr. Conche, It. Conca; Sp. Concha; Lat. Concha, a shell; Gr. Κογχη, which Lennep thinks is formed from Εχεσθαι, adhærere, from its adhering to rocks; and Scheidius from Κο-ειν, the obsolete Greek primitive of the Lat. Cavare, to hollow; and observes that the cavities or hollows in which the eyes lie, were called κογχαι.

He furnishes her closet first and fills
The crowded shelves with rarities of shells,
Adds orient pearls which from the conchs he drew,
And all the sparkling stones of various hue.
Dryden. Ovid. Met. b. x.

——— But when the earth
Hath made her annual progress round the sun,
What time the conch or bell resounds, they may
All to the cane ground, with thy gang repair.
Grainger. The Sugar Cane, b. iv.

One of them kept blowing a large conch-shell, to which a reed of two feet long was fixed: at first, with a continued tone of the same kind, but he, afterward, converted it into a kind of musical instrument, perpetually repeating two or three notes, with the same strength.
Cook. Voyage, vol. vi. b. iii. c. 1.

CONCI'LIAR. CONCI'LIARY, adj. CONCI'LIARLY. } See COUNCIL, and CONCILIATE. Of, pertaining or belonging to, a council.

But they have kept the bridle in their own hands, and made a reserve of their own power, that if need be, they may make new pretensions, or not be put to it to justifie the old by the engagement of a conciliary declaration.
Bp. Taylor. Liberty of Prophesying, s. 5.

In effect the emperor was president, though not as a judge in spiritual matters, yet as an orderer of the conciliar transactions.—Barrow. Of the Pope's Supremacy.

Our most holy lord the Pope said in answer thereunto, that he would maintain and inviolably observe all and every of those things that were conciliarly determined, concluded and decreed by the present council in matters of faith.
Id. Ib.

CONCI'LIATE. CONCILIA'TING, n. CONCILIA'TION. CONCI'LIATORY. CONCI'LIABLE, adj. CONCI'LIABLE, n. } Fr. Concilier; It. Conciliare; Sp. Conciliar; Lat. Conciliare, Martinius says, seems properly convocare in concilium, and then uniri. And Vossius,—from concilium is conciliare; which is—Amicum reddere animisque conjungere. See COUNCIL, and RECONCILE.

To unite, or conjoin; to win or gain, (sc.) to some common purpose or design. To win or gain, (sc.) the affections, the favour, the good-will.

"Fr. Concilier,—to attone, to reconcile, accord or make friends together; to join or knit in love one with another," (Cotgrave.)

Conciliables, in Fox and Bacon, is immediately from the "Fr. Conciliabule, a conventicle; a small or private assembly," (Cotgrave.)

It is not long agoo sence some kinges gaue their daughters to forein kinges in maryage to conciliate amitie, and what succeeded therof? thei neuer sence agreed well.
Joye. Expostcion of Daniel, c. 11.

That the conciliable or assembly indicted heretofore by the said Bishop, should now be kept at Vicenza, the first of May next ensuing.
Wyatt. Works. Ap. No. 9. By the King, an. 29.

[You] plainly shew the whole world, that by these your conciliables, your hutter mutter in corners, you take away all hope of a lawful Catholike and general councell
Fox. Martyrs, p. 989. Hen. VIII.

Nor doth he put away adulterously who complains of causes rooted in immutable nature, utter unfitness, utter disconformity, not conciliable, because not to be amended without a miracle.—Milton. Nullities in Marriage.

Thus have we read and seen to be fulfilled that which followeth, Ecce in deserto, ecce in penetralibus: while some have sought the truth in the conventicles and conciliables of heretics and sectaries; others in the external face and representation of the church, and both sorts have been seduced.—Bacon. Church Controversies.

And first for the explanation, Thus saith the Lord. A solemn preface of God's holy prophets to conciliate authority, and to excite the reverent attention of their hearers to what they are about to say.—Bp. Bull, vol. ii. Ser. 18.

Which moveth us, with the advice of our nobility and council, to offer to our said good brother the ministry and office of you, our ambassadors, to remain there, and proceed in the former commission, for conciliation of some good between our said good brother and the French king.
Strype. Memorials. Q. Mary, an. 1553.

It were to be supposed, though Eusebius had not said it, that these evangelists and apostolical men, and founders of uncorrupted Christianity in various places, had the power of working miracles, to introduce themselves to strangers, and to conciliate their regard and respect.
Jortin. Rem. on Ecclesiastical History.

The house has gone farther; it has declared conciliation admissible, previous to any submission on the part of America.—Burke. On Conciliation with America.

Then I considered within myself the bad policy, in such a conjuncture of Cato and Brutus and easily approved in my own mind the more pliant and conciliating method of Cicero.—Hurd. On Sincerity in the Commerce. World, Dial. 1.

We are taught to believe, that a desire of domineering over our countrymen is love to our country; that those who hate civil war abet rebellion, and that the amiable, conciliatory virtues of lenity, moderation, and tenderness to the privileges of those, who depend on this kingdom, are a sort of treason to the state.—Burke. Let. to the Sheriffs of Bristol.

Thus we have heard the heroes of old times
Applauded, who, though furiously incens'd,
Were yet obedient to the gentle sway
Of reason and conciliatory gifts.—Cowper. Hom. It. b. ix.

CONCI'NNATE, v. CONCI'NNATE, adj. CONCINNITY. } Lat. Concinnare, (a concinendo,) est aptè componere, (Festus.) Varro observes, Concinnè loqui dictum a concinno, ubi inter se conveniunt partes et inter se respondent aliud alii. And Joseph Scaliger, Concinnè loqui dictum a concinere; and Julius Scaliger, a canendo, (See Martinius.) Vossius does not coincide; he thinks that concinnere is from concinnus; but whence concinnus? he adds, Non æquè paret.

To place fitly together, suitably, becomingly, decently, neatly; to make neat or clear; to clear or purify.

The manne (Adrian of Castella) was of profounde learninge and knowlege, not vulgare, but straunge, newe and difficile, and in especial he was a manne of ripe iudgement in electinge and choosynge concinnate termes, and apte and eloquente woordes.—Hall. Hen. VII. an. 8.

Cato setteth down a receit to trim and concinnate wine (for that is the very tearm which he useth—sc. concinnari,) in this manner.—Holland. Plinie, b. xiv. c. 20.

I am the more perswaded of the concinnity of this notion, when I consider the uncouth harshness either of the way of actuall concreated knowledge, or of infant growing faculties.
Glanvill. Vanity of Dogmatizing, c. 1.

And thus much in answer of the two principal foundations whereon this opinion is built. As for the concinnity and coherence which it hath within itself, I easily allow it.
Raleigh. History of the World, b. iii. c. 1. s. 5.

That which afforded me most entertainment in those Miscellanies, was Dr. Henry King's Poems, wherein I find not only heat and strength, but also an exact concinnity and evenness of fancy.—Howell, b. ii. Let. 16.

CONCI'SE, adj. CONCI'SELY. CONCI'SENESS. CONCI'SION. } Fr. Concis; It. and Sp. Conciso; Lat. Concidere, concisum, (con, and cædere, to cut.) Cut into parts or portions; severed, separated, curtailed, lessened, or diminished; shortened, abbreviated, or abridged; short or brief.

Lest too concise injuriously we wrong
Things that such state and fearfulness impart,
Or led by zeal irregularly long
Infringe the curious liberties of art.
Drayton. Moses, his Birth and Miracles, b. ii.

A sage Laconic, truly wise,
Whose conversation was concise,
Train'd up in rigid schools;
Once when a single word would do,
Had lavishly made use of two,
In high contempt of rules. Yalden, Fab. 16.

He expresses himself so concisely, employs words so sparingly, that whoever will possess his ideas, must dig for them, and oftentimes pretty far below the surface.
Richardson. Life of Milton

But to return from this digression, though it was almost necessary, all the rules of painting are methodically, concisely, and yet clearly delivered in this present treatise which I have translated.
Dryden. A Parallel between Poetry and Painting

Tasso tells us in his letters, that Sperone Speroni, a great Italian wit, who was his contemporary, observed of Virgil and Tully, that the Latin orator endeavoured to imitate the copiousness of Homer, the Greek poet, and that the Latin poet made it his business to reach the conciseness of Demosthenes, the Greek orator
Id. Preface to the Second Miscellany.

And being so, I think, those of the concision who made it [the division] would do well to consider, whether that which our Saviour assures us will destroy a kingdom, be the likeliest way to settle and support a church.
South, vol. iii. Ep. Ded.

To tell you the truth, I was once inclined to be somewhat angry at the shortness of your letters, but I am now so well reconciled to your concise manner, that I condemn my own as downright loquacity, and shall make your epistles the models of mine.—Melmoth. Cicero, b. xv. Let. 11.

For these reasons, we sometimes, perhaps find ourselves disposed to lament the conciseness and obscurity of that account which Moses hath left us of man's primeval estate in paradise.—Bp. Horne, vol. iv. Dis. 2. Garden of Eden.

CONCITA'TION. Fr. Concitation; It. Concitazione; Sp. Concitacion; Lat. Concitare, atum, (con, and cito, from Cieo.) See CITE.

A moving or causing to move; a raising or causing to rise.

For the revelations of heaven are conveied by new impresions, and the immediate illumination of the soul, whereas the deceiving spirit, by concitation of humours, produceth his concieted phantasms, or by compounding the species already reading, doth make up words which mentally speak his intentions.—Brown. Vul. Errours, b. i. c. 10.

CONCI'TIZEN. Fr. Concitoyen, a fellow-citizen. See CITIZEN.

For what is it to me by whom I suffer evil of one and the same kinde and degree, whether it be by a neighbour, or a stranger, or a foreigner or a con-citizen.
Knox. History of Reformation, Pref

This moues me, my distress
And sorrowes sometime to conceale,
Lest that the torments which I feele
Might likewise my con-citizens annoy.
Stirling. Aurora, s. 2.

CONCLAMA'TION. Lat. Conclamare, atum, (con, and clamare, voce contendere.) Clamare—simplicis oris est; conclamare, cum aliis. (See Martinius.) See CLAMOUR.

A calling or shouting out together.

But whether that mournful burthen and treble calling out after Absalom, had any reference to the last conclamation, and triple valediction, used by other nations, we hold but a wavering conjecture.—Browne. Urne Burial, c. 1.

Mute is their sorrow; such a silent woe
A dying man's amazed houshold show,
Before his funerall conclamation,
Before the mother's lamentation
Call on the seruants weeping.—May. Lucan, b. ii.

CO'NCLAVE, n. Lat. Con, and clavis, a key; It. Sp. and Fr. Conclave; seldom used, says Cotgrave, except to express that secret or private roome, wherein the Cardinals (qui unam habent clavem communem, Minshew,) assemble about the election of a Pope. Also applied to—

The Assembly itself.

And thus whan that he passed was,
The cardinals that wolden saue
The form of lawe in the conclaue,
Gon for to chese a new Pope.—Gower. Con. A. b. ii.

This shall be onely to advertise your highness, that after great and long altercations and contrariety which hath depended between the cardinalls in the conclave, they at last fully resolved and determined (the faction of France abandoned) to elect and choose either my Lord Cardinal de Medici, or me.
Burnet. Records, pt. iii. b. i. No. 9. Wolsey to the King

At Caer-leon, in Monmouth, after his victories, a pompous celebration was at Whitsuntide, whither were invited divers kings and princes of the neighbouring coasts: he with them, and his queen Guinever, with the ladies, keeping those solemnities in their several conclaves
Selden. Illust. of Drayton's Poly Olbion, s. 4

And if they saw the adverse party too strong in the conclave, so that they could carry nothing, then Gardiner was to draw a protestation, which should be made in the name of the two crowns; and that being made, all the cardinals of their faction were to leave the conclave.

Burnet. History of the Reformation, an. 1529.

And, in its secret conclave, as it feels
The body's woes and joys, thus ruling power
Wields at its will the dull material world,
And is the body's health or malady.

CONCO'CT, v. CONCO'CTER. CONCO'CTION. CONCO'CTIVE. Lat. Con, and coquere, coctum. (See COCTION.) Cotgrave says, "Fr. Concoction,—a boyling, or seething of meat in the stomach."

To boil, or seethe together; and thus, to dissolve, or reduce into a state of nourishment, or growth. (Met.) to digest, to mature; to ripen. And see the quotation from Bacon.

For cold maketh appetite, but naturall heate concocteth or boyleth.—Sir T. Elyot. Castel of Helth, b. ii.

The meates and drynkes receyued into the body, if the stomake and lyuer doo their naturall office, be altered by concoction and digestiõ in suche wise that the best part therof goth in the nourishment of the body.—Id. Ib. b. iii.

The word Concoction, or digestion, is chiefly taken into use from living creatures and their organs; and from thence extended to liquors and fruits, &c.; therefore they speak of meat concocted, &c. The constantest notion of concoction is, that it should signifie the degrees of alteration, of one body into another, from crudity to perfect concoction, which is the ultimity of that action or process

Bacon. Nat. Hist. § 838.

For as Arrian saith of those, who read many books and digest none, so is it most true of those who do not concoct their πολυμαθειαν and turn it into spiritual nourishment of the soul, εμουσοι και ανωφελεστατοι they vomit it up again, and are never the better for it.

Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 650.

And can this private concocter of malecontent, at the very instant when he pretends to extol the parlament, afford thus to blur over, rather than to mention that public triumph of their justice and constancy so high, so glorious, so reviving to the fainted commonwealth.

Milton. An Apology for Smectymnuus.

Whenever any of them is resolved, it appears to be compounded of some of these five, to wit, the attractive, the retentive, the secretive, the concoctive, and the expulsive faculty.

Digby. Of Bodies, c. 14.

Besides, as she takes the child out of mere necessity, her food will be accordingly, or else very coarse at best; whence proceeds an ill concocted and coarse food for the child; for as the blood, so is the milk.—Spectator, No. 246.

This was an errour in the first concoction, and therefore never to be mended in the second or the third.

Dryden. Preface to Œdipus.

For him the cane with little labour grows;
Spite of the dog star, shoots long yellow joints;
Concocts rich juice, though deluges descend.

Grainger. The Sugar Cane, b. i.

Hence the concoctive powers, with various art,
Subdue the cruder aliments to chyle.

Armstrong. The Art of Preserving Health.

CONCO'LOUR, adj. It. Concolore. Having one, or being of one and the same, colour. See COLOUR.

Thus in concolour animals, and such as are confined unto one colour, we measure not their beauty thereby; for if a crow or black bird grow white, we generally account it more pretty.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. vi. c. 11.

CONCO'MITATE, v. CONCO'MITANT, adj. CONCO'MITANT, n. CONCO'MITANCE. CONCO'MITANCY. CONCO'MITANTLY. CONCOMITA'TION. Lat. Con, and comitans, pres. part. of Comitare, from Comire, (cum, and ire,) to go with. Comitans, one who goes with, or accompanies another, or others; the reduplication con, is merely emphatical.

To go with, to accompany, attend upon, to be associated or connected with.

My second cause why I was condemned an heretike is, that I denied transubstantiation and concomitation, two lurking words of the papists, by the which they doe beleeue, and will compell all other to beleeue, that Christ's naturall bodie is made of bread, and the Godhead by and by to bee ioyned thereunto.—Fox. Martyrs. Dr. Taylor defendeth Priests' Marriage, p. 1383.

This simple bloody spectation of the lungs, is differenced from that which concomitates a pleurisy.

Harvey. On Consumption.

So that every thing for want of it [faith] is turned into sin, and thereby depopulating the whole man, making him nothing in the world but ruins and noysomness, a confluence of all manner of sins, without any concomitant degree of duty or obedience.—Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 657.

He made him the chief concomitant of his heir apparent, and only son, our dear soveraign now being on a journey of much adventure.—Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 212.

And so compared, this first work, and the concomitants of it at first, have some things therein which may and should cause us to look upon it as a most abounding mercy.

Goodwin. Works, vol. v. pt. i. p. 374.

And therefore the dream of the Church of Rome that he that receives the body receives also the blood, because by concomitance, the blood is received in the body, is neither true nor pertinent to this question.

Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. ii. c. 3.

The pretence of concomitancie is so poore a shift, that it hurts them rather, for if by virtue thereof the body of Christ is no lesse in the wine, than the blood is in the bread, it will necessarily follow, that they might as wel hold back the bread, and give the cup: as hold back the cup, and give the bread.—Bp. Hall. The Old Religion.

Some previous, as well as concomitant qualifications are requisite to the due exercise, and influence of it [Christianity].—Law. Theory of Religion, pt. i.

And being grown rich with trade, they fell to all manner of looseness and debauchery; the usual concomitant of wealth, and as commonly the fore runner of ruin.

Dampier. Voyage, an. 1688.

This apostle most expresaly declaring that a man is justified ἐξ ἔργων, by works, the particle ἐξ, by, or out of, must manifestly denote somewhat more than an idle concomitance.—Nelson. Life of Bull.

In the same sense, therefore, that the wicked may be said to repent, they may be said to haue their prayers and services accepted; that is, the wicked antecedently so taken, and (as they speak, in sensu diviso) to wit, before the instant of their repentance, not concomitantly, and in sensu composito: the wicked, as such, and while he is such, can neither repent nor pray, nor have any audience or acceptance at a throne of grace.—South, vol. ix. Ser. 10.

In contemplation, therefore, of these benefits, I recommend this mode of catechising, and of expounding the catechism in occasional concomitant discourses, to all my brethren very particularly.—Hurd. Charge to the Clergy of Worcester, 1809.

That all motion is in time, and therefore, wherever it exists, implies time as its concomitant, is evident to all, and requires no proving.—Harris. Hermes, b. i. c. 6.

The length of this account I flatter myself will be excused, as it contains a few curious particulars, which are not foreign to the subject, and which concomitantly illustrate the history of the arts.—Walpole. Life of Vertue.

CO'NCORD, v. CO'NCORD, n. CONCO'RDABLE. CONCO'RDANT, adj. CONCO'RDANT, n. CONCO'RDANCE. CONCO'RDANCY. CONCO'RDANTLY. CONCO'RDATE. CONCO'RDLY. Fr. Concorder; Lat. Concors, (con, and cor, the heart;) Gr. Κεαρ, of uncertain etymology.

To be of one and the same heart, or mind; to have the same will or inclination, the same wish or desire; to be in union, harmony, agreement; to be unanimous, to agree, to harmonize.

"A Concordance is a Dictionary or Index to the Bible, wherein all the words used through the inspired writers are arranged alphabetically, and the various places where they occur are referred to, to assist us in finding out passages, and comparing the several significations of the same word." (Cruden.)

For in cronike of time ago
I fynde a tale concordable.—Gower. Con. A. b. ii.

But vnderstandinge that it was concorded and concludde, he forthwith retourned to the sayde place of Amphipolis by the commaundemente of the Lacedemonyans.
Nicoll. Thucydides, fol. 132.

At musicke's sacred sounde my fansies eft begonne
In concordes, discordes, notes and cliffes, in tunes of unisonne.—Gascoigne. Vpon the Fruit of Letters.

After whiche concord made, the cardinall and the archebishop of Yorke, did many thynges without the consent of the kynge or the duke.—Hall. Hen. VI. an. 19.

They crie out vpon us at this present euerie where that we are al heritiques, and haue forsaken the faith & haue with newe persuasions, & wicked learning vtterly dissolued the concorde of the church.—Jewell. Def. of the Apol. p. 10.

Thus whenne Brute had deuyded this Isle of Brytayne, as before is shewed, in thre parts, & had holden ye principate therof nobly by the terme of xxxiiii yeres, after most concordaunce of wryters, he dyed.—Fayban, vol. i. c. 4.

Let them forethinke and deliberat togither prudentlie, and what they deliberat wiselie, let them accomplish concordlie, not iarring nor swarming one from the other.
Fox. Martyrs. Epistle of Gregorie, p. 106.

Be it knowne to your discretion or kinglye prudence, that forasmuch as this erection of Stephen Langton hath orderlie & concordlie thus proceeded without fraud or deceit, vpon a person meet for the same, therefore we will not for no man's pleasure, neither may we without danger of fame and of conscience, defer or protract ame longer the consummation of the said erection.—Id. Ib. Pope Innoc. to the King, p. 228.

If the true concorde of well tuned sounds
By vnions married, do offend thine ear,
They do but sweetly chide thee who confounds
In singleness the parts that thou should'st bear.
Shakespeare, s. 8.

Concord's true picture shineth in this art,
Where divers men and women ranked be;
And every one doth dance a several part,
Yet all as one, in measure do agree
Observing perfect uniformity.—Davies. On Dancing.

And all the quire that wont with her to bear a part and sing Concordant discords in sweet straine for welcome of the spring,
Sate silent on the frostie bow, and shuddering all for cold,
Did shroud the head beneath the wing.
Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 556.

Neither their acts were notable in the age wherein they lived, nor the length of their reigns any way helpful to the concordance of times, foregoing or succeeding.
Raleigh. History of the World, b. iii. c. 1. s. 4.

Be pleased to consider, That the very word faith is in Scripture infinitely ambiguous, insomuch that in the Latine concordances of S. Hierom's Bible, published by Robert Stephens, you may see no less than twenty two several senses and acceptations of the word faith, set down with the several places of Scripture referring to them.
Bp. Taylor, vol. iii. Ser. 3.

Why I did thinke so, I gave my reasons by speciall reciting many concordants inter partes.
R. Mountagu. Appeale to Cæsar, p. 84.

Whereupon we may say, that they who treate this accommodation [divine love, and humane passion,] are of Micha's disciples who hope to lodge concordantly together an idol, and an ephod, making only as it were a cell apart for God, and expect as he did, to prosper in this concordancy.
W. Mountague. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 13. s. 7.

Till Edgar grateful (as to those who pine
A dismal half year night, the orient beam
Of Pandion's lamp arose, and into one
Cemented all the long contending powers,
Pacific monarch, then her lovely head
Concord rear'd high, and all around diffus'd
The spirit of love. J. Philips. Cider, b. ii.

But however the matter of this letter being such a concordance with those instructions, bearing date November 19, and the letter of Cromwell, January 7.
Strype. Memorials, an. 1538.

How comes he to number the want of synods in the Gallican church among the grievances of that concordate.—Swift.

Silent as evening, lo the list'ning throng,
While from his lips the glowing periods fall,
Drink sweet persuasion streaming from his tongue
And the firm chain of concord binds them all.
Fawkes. Aurelius.

CON-CO'RPORATE, v. } Lat. Con, and
CONCORPORA'TION. } corpus, body. See CORPORAL.

To unite into one body; to embody.

Of Eucharistia, (I find in the Scripture) in which we be concorporated into Christ, and made lively members of his body, nourished and fed to the everlasting life, if we receive it as we ought to do, and else it is to us rather death than life.—Burnet. Rec. b. iii. n. 21. Of the Sacrament, Q. 7.

Even as if he [the flatterer] went about in some great pasture to make toward one beast, whom he purposeth to tame and bring to hand, by little and little joyning close unto him, as it were to be concorporated in the same studies and exercises, in the same affections, employments and course of life.—Holland. Plutarch, p. 73.

For as the excessive humiditie of the one looseneth the rind, so the want of vitall moisture in the other, will not suffer it to unite and concorporate.—Id. Plinie, b. xvii. c. 14.

That one centre, which the soul is hight,
Which knows this world by the close unitie,
Concorporation with the mundane spright.
More. On the Soul, b. ii. c. 1. s. 26.

And the word, which St. James pronounces able to save our souls, he describes as a graff, which must not only be closely embraced by that, wherein it is to fructify, but must continue there, to bring the stock and graff to (if I may so speak) concorporate.—Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 293.

Saint John scruples not to affirm, that "if a man say I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar;" as concorporating things inconsistent, and uniting things distanter than the two poles of heaven.—Id. Ib. vol. vi. p. 28.

CON-COURSE, n. Fr. Concours; It. and Sp. Concurso, (con, and currere, cursum, to run.) See To CONCUR.

A running or flocking together; a meeting, an assembly, a conjunction; a concurrence.

For this myracle great concourse of people yerely in the vi. kalendis of Marche cõmith with great deuocion vnto the sayd monastery, there makyng theyr oblacions, fermly beleuyng yt sayd churche was halowed with Crystis own hande.
Fabyan, vol. i. c. 132.

Whan sodenly Aeneas seeth great concourse to throng
Both mighty Anteas and Serestus, and Cloanthus strong.
Phaer. Virgil. Æneidos, b. i.

The host all readie to depart away,
Intending first in funerall flames to burne
Her fatal pride, and all her pomp o'erturne,
Did in thicke concourse cluster to confound
Her high top towers and eu'n them with the ground.
Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 868.

——— Thus, ruling, he restrain'd
The host from flight, and then again the councell was maintained
With such a concourse, that the shore rung with the tumult made. Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. ii.

He that aims at a good end, and knows he uses the proper means to attain it, why should he despair of success, since effects naturally follow their causes, and the divine providence is wont to afford its concourse to such proceedings.—Barrow, vol. i. Ser. 1.

Nay, the machine of God's making, is so imperfect, according to these gentlemen, that he is obliged to clean it now and then by an extraordinary concourse, and even to mend it, as a clock maker mends his work.
Clarke. Leibnitz's First Paper.

Hence were formed colleges or sodalities of men of letters, who taught arts and sciences, and drew together a concourse of youths desirous of instruction, and thus by degrees those larger schools were erected, which in the next age were called Universities.—Jortin. Rem. on Eccles. Hist. an. 1101.

CON-CREA'TE. Con, and creare, creatum. (See CREATE.) Fr. Concréer,—

To breed, compose, make, or create together, (Cotgrave.)

For some men finding reason to be that guide, which God hath given us, and concreated with us, know that religion which is superinduc'd and comes after it, cannot prejudice that noblest part of this creation.
Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. i. c. 2.

I am the more perswaded of the concinnity of this notion, when I consider the uncouth harshness either of the way of actuall concreated knowledge, or of infant growing faculties.—Glanvill. The Vanity of Dogmatizing, c. 1.

For if it be not, then neither we nor Adam could by nature do things above nature; and if God did concreate grace with Adam, that grace was nevertheless grace, for being given him as soon as he was made.
Bp. Taylor. On Repentance, c. 6. s. 4.

CON-CRE'DIT. Lat. Concredere, (con, and credere, itum.) Vossius prefers from Gr. Χρηζειν, id est, mutuum dare. See CREDIT.

To deliver, commit, or consign to the trust; to intrust.

The which reason may well be applied to excuse every Christian from it (swearing), who is a priest to the most high God, and hath most celestial and important matters concreated to him, in comparison to which all other matters are very mean and inconsiderable.—Barrow, vol. i. Ser. 15.

To grow together, to grow or unite together, to coalesce, to cohere, to coagulate, to congeal.

For the logical use, see the example from Locke.

Those same vapours being lette to evaporate or passe forth out of the head therfore be concrete or gathered into humour superfluous.—Sir T. Elyot. Castel of Helth, b. iv.

And on that sleue these wordes were wrete
A false abstracte cometh from a false concrete.
Skelton. The Bowge of Courte.

For all coral is not hard, and in many concreted parts some parts remain unpetrified, that is, the quick and the liveller parts remain as wood, and were never yet converted.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. ii. c. 5.

Who came close on, and with his dart strooke Duke Apisaon
Whose surname was Phæsiades, even to the concrete blood
That makes the liver, on the earth, out gusht his vital bloud. Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. xi.

I desire, that in the text this difference may be observed, between the things that Christ hath done for the effecting and accomplishment of that peace.
1st, What was transacted and done simply and abstractedly in his own person alone, for the procurement of it, on the cross.
2d, What he works efficiently in us, (tho' concretely, in himself, upon us) by his spirit, and through providences, to full accomplishment thereof.
Goodwin. Works, vol. i. pt. iii. p. 11.

When these greedy flames shall have devoured whatever was combustible and converted into a smoak and vapour all grosser concretions, that great orb of fire that the Cartesian philosophy supposeth to constitute the centre of this globe, shall perfectly have recovered its pristine nature.
Glanvill. Pre-existence of Souls, p. 178.

That little stony plant which Johnson nameth, Hippuris Caroliniana, and Gesner Folia manum Arenosa, we have found in fresh water, which is the less concrete portion of that element.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. ii. c. 5.

Let me request you to weigh that of St. Paul, Ephesians v. 5, which are urged by some ancients: and to remember how often he calls concupiscence sin; whereby it is urged, that although baptism take away the guilt as concretely redounding to the person, yet the simple abstracted guilt, as to the nature remains; for sacraments are administered to persons, not to natures.
Bp. Taylor. Polem. Disc. p. 907. Bp. Rochester's Let.

And seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor a substance inchoate, or in any way of perfection, how any other substance should thence take concrescence, it hath not been taught.—Raleigh. History of the World, b. i. c. 1. s. 10.

There is the conjunction and cohesion of the matter into a more loose or indigested or softer consistency, like mortar or clay, and thereby it is prepared to the concrement of a pebble or flint.—Hale. Origin. of Mankind, p. 76.

[They say] this destroyeth my own foundation, which supposeth a creation or concrement of those very bodies, which I suppose to be mixed.—Id. Ib. p. 77.

This distinction of names shews us also the difference of our ideas: For if we observe them, we shall find that our simple ideas have all abstract, as well as concrete names; the one whereof is (to speak the language of grammarians) a substantive, the other an adjective; as whiteness, white, sweetness, sweet.—Locke. Hum. Underst. b. iii. c. 3. s. 1.

The particles of tinging substances and salts dissolved in water do not of their own accord concrete and fall to the bottom, but diffuse themselves all over the liquor, and expand still more if you add more liquor to them.
Boyle. Life. Works, vol. i. p. 114. Letter of Sir I. Newton.

I have not yet found by what I have heard of those artists, that though they pretend to bring the several substances, into which the fire has divided the concrete, to an exquisite simplicity, they pretend also to be able by the fire to divide all concretes, minerals, and others, into the same number of distinct substances.—Id. Ib. vol. i. p. 544.

The latter of which is a thing, which men have been necessitated to, in order to the computation or reckoning of the properties of bodies, the comparing of them with one another, the adding, suntracting, multiplying, and dividing of them, which could not be done, so long as they are taken concretely together with their subjects.

Cudworth. Intellectual System, p. 67.

That there does also intervene a various local motion of such small bodies, will scarce be denied; whether we choose to grant the origin of concretions assigned by Epicurus, or that related by Moses.—Boyle. Works, vol. I. p. 474.

How, for example, could there be such a science as optics, were we necessitated to contemplate colour concreted with figure, two attributes which the eye can never view, but associated!—Harris. Hermes, b. iii. c. 4.

In a fabulous age every odd substance that was flung ashore received that name: [halcyon's nest] a species of tubular coral, a sponge, a zoophyte, and a miscellaneous concrete having by the ancients been dignified with that title from their imaginary origin.—Pennant. Brit. Zool. Kingfisher.

He relates, that it [the halcyon's nest] resembled those concretions that are formed by the sea water.—Id. Ib.

CONCRE'W, v. Lat. Concrescere, to grow together. See above, CONCRETE.

And his faire locks, that wont with oyntment sweet
To be embaulm'd, and sweat out dainty dew,
He let to growe, and grisely to concrew,

He wolde suffre for a quart of wine,
A good felaw to haue his concubine
A twelve month, and excuse him at the full.

Chaucer. Prologue, v. 652.

He the mightie God forsoke
Ageyn the lawe whan hee toke
His wyues and the concubines
Of hem that were Sarasines.—Gower. Con. A. b. vii.

And moreouer they saide, it should be a great shame for theym, that such a duchesse, come of so base a blode (and concubine to the duke in his other wyfe's dayes) shulde go and haue the preemynence before them.

Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. ii. c. 210.

That is, take from the church honourable marriage and the bed vndefiled, shalt thou not replenishe it with concubinaries, with incestuous persons, sodomiticall vices, and finally with al kinde of beastly filthinesse.—Fox. Martyrs. Allegations against Sixe Articles. (Hen. VIII.) p. 1064.

In this constitution, if the Lorde Cromwell and other good men of the parliament might haue had their will, there is no doubt, but the first crime of these concubinarie priests, as well as the second had had the same penalty, as the other six articles had, and should haue bin punished with death.—Id. Ib. p. 1074.

And covenants of cohabitation are either for society of bed or for society of all things; if for society of bed only, then the woman is called a concubine. And here also the child shall be his or hers, as they shall agree particularly by covenant. For although for the most part, a concubine is supposed to yield up the right of her children to the father, yet doth not concubinage enforce so much.

Hobbs. De Corpore Politico, pt. ii. c. 4.

It is but reasonable to believe, that the Holy Ghost will not descend upon the simonical unchaste concubinaries, schismaticks and scandalous priests, and excommunicate.

Bp. Taylor, vol. I. Ser. 6.

Amongst the ancients, and for a long time in the civil law, such marriages [against the consent of parents] were esteem'd illegitimate, and no better than a mere concubinate.

Id. Rule of Conscience, b. iii. c. 5.

Then the marriage of the priests should be in the Pope's hands, who might admit the same; and the concubinate of many should be forgiven, for we see few chaste.

Strype. Memorials. Edw. VI. an. 1539.

Also their country was very infamous for concubinacy, adultery, and incest: some kept four concubines together.

Id. Ib. an. 1549.

The bad tendency of Mr. Pope's Eloisa to Abelard is remarked by Sir John Hawkins, in his History of Music, vol. ii. p. 33, as depreciating matrimony, and justifying concubinage. This is founded on a false fact; Abelard was married.—Bp. Horne. Essays & Thoughts.

CONCU'LCATE, v. Fr. Conculquer; Sp. Conculcar; It. Conculcare; Lat. Conculcare, atum, (con, and calcare,) calcibus premere; to press with the heels.

To tread, or trample upon.

Doe not thou conculcate thyselfe, and man ouercometh thee not.—State Trials. The Protestation of J. Wiclif.

But he (that notwithstanding) groweth from evil to worse, oppressing and conculcating the church and sanctuary of of God.—Fox. Martyrs. Becket's Letter to the Pope, p. 197.

And to conclude, as in effect, in despite of God, conculcating and trampling under foot whatsoever is named God, [Mahomet] advanceth his own (blasphemous reprobate and forlorne miscreant as he is) divine power and authority forsooth in the Divel's name above all things whatsoever in heaven and earth.—Mountayn. Appeale to Cæsar, p. 153.

CONCU'PISCENCE. CONCU'PISCIBLE. } Fr. Concupiscence; It. Concupiscenza, Sp. Concupiscentia; Lat. Concupiscere, (con, and cupere.) Cupere est magis quam velle, (Vossius.) And concupiscere is more still:—

To wish for, or desire ardently; to lust after.

For concupiscible in Measure for Measure, the modern editors, as Mr. Steevens observes, unauthoritatively substitute concupiscent.

But as they were the children of God, which were inwardly circumcised, euen so they that are washed inwardly from the concupiscens of thys worlde, are the members of Christ, whom Paule affirmeth so to be purged through his bloud.—Frith. Workes, p. 71

That other dotes, and drineth forth his dayes
In vaine delight, and foul concupiscence,
When works of weight, might occupie his hedde.

Gascoigne. The Steele Glass.

Which lust or evil concupiscence he at last defines to be an insatiable intemperance of the appetite, never filled with a desire, never ceasing in the persecution of evil; and again he calls it, our birth and nativity derived to us by our parents, i. e. an evil affection hereditary to us, and delivered to us as a legacy at our birth and nativity.

Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 689.

Perturbations and passions, which trouble the phantasie, though they dwell betweene the confines of sense and reason, yet they are drowned in corporeall organs of sense, they are commonly reduced into two inclinations, irascible and concupiscible.—Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 97.

The Stoicks and Epicureans hold, that they [plants] have no soule or life at all; for of animall creatures some have the appetitive and concupiscible soule, others the reasonable: but plants grow after a sort casually of their owne accord, and not by the means of any soule.

Holland. Plutarch, p. 694.

she would not but by gift of my chaste body
To his concupiscible intemperate lust,
Release my brother.—Shakes. Meas. for Meas. Act v. sc. 1.

There is in every man a certain propensity to vice, or a corrupt principle more or less disposing him to evil, which principle is sometimes called the flesh, sometimes concupiscence, and sometimes sensuality, and makes one part of that, which we call original sin.—South, vol. v. Ser. I.

Now there being a double object for the will of man to work upon, good and evil, there is likewise a double faculty considerable in it; the one we call a concupiscible, the other an irascible faculty; by the one we follow that which is good, by the other we run from that which is evil.

Bp. Beveridge, vol. ii. Ser. 137.

Avarice and ambition are abroad watching for her in the day, while concupiscence, like a pestilence, walketh in darkness.—Bp. Horne. On the Psalms, Ps. 91.

CONCU'R, v. CONCU'RRENT, adj. CONCU'RRENT, n. CONCU'RRENTLY. CONCU'RRENCE. CONCU'RRENCY. CONCU'RSION. } Fr. Concourir; It. Concorrere; Sp. Concurrir; Lat. Concurrere, (con, and currere,) to run together. See CONCOURSE.

To run together or in unison, by agreement, with one will, to one goal or end; to conjoin or combine, to meet together, to unite, to agree or assent to.

And here is it diligently to be noted: that in all such rites, ceremonies, or sacramentes of God thus instituted: these two thinges (that is to witte, the thyng signified, and the signe, that signifieth) be concurrraunt and inseparable.

Tyndall. Workes, p. 468.

But of these spiritual lawes yt were made for ye repressing of heresies, with which our tēporal lawes are so conformable and concurrant; (these am I boūd to medle with.)

Sir T. More. Workes, p. 1015.

Saint Paul, Tom. iii. and Tit. i. sheweth what qualities a bishop or a pastor ought to haue: but he doth not say, that if none can be founde, or not a sufficient number, in whom all these qualities do concurre, that then the church shal rather be destitute of ministers, than have such.

Whitgift. Defence, p. 253.

How was this goodly architecture wrought?
Or by what meane were they together brought?
They err, that say they did concur by chance,
Love made them meet in a well-ordered dance.

Davies. On Dancing. The Orchestra.

So all the labours that I long have lost,
As one that was but wrestling with the winds,
May once in end concurre to blesse my state.

Stirling. Aurora, s. 1.

——— No decree of mine
Concurring to necessitate his fall.—Milton. Par. Lost, b x.

Whereupon in the bill newly passed this session for a triennial parliament, for time to come, there is special provision made how the parliament shall be summoned and convented by the lords, commons, and great officers of the realme, themselves, without the king's concurrent assent (though by his writ and in his name) in case of his neglect or wilfull refusall to summon one within that time.

Prynne. Treachery and Disloyalty of Papists.

As for the Mirmillones, hee deprived them of their armour. One of them named Columbus, fortuned to foile his concurrent, howbeit hee had gotten before some small hurt.—Holland. Suetonius, p. 149.

How long this Tibni, the new competitor of Omri held out, I do not find, only it appears that his side was decay'd, and so he died, leaving no other successor than his concurrent.—Raleigh. History of the World, b. ii. c. 19. s. 5.

Those things which are made of God himselfe immediately by himselfe, without the concurrence of second causes, cannot be vnmade by any inferiour cause, but by him alone by whom they were first made.—Hakewill. Apologie, p. 18.

That height of fortune either is control'd
By some more pow'rful overlooking eye,
(That doth the fulness of thy grace withhold)
Or countercheck'd with some concurrency,
That it doth cost far more adoe to hold
The height attain'd, than was to get so high.

Daniel. Chorus in Philotas.

All of them (the last excepted) were dejected by King James without any concurrency of the Duke.

Cabbala. To his Sacred Majestie

As in thy pictures light consents with shade,
And each to other is subservient made,
Judgment and genius so concur in thee,
And both unite in perfect harmony.

Congreve. To Sir Godfrey Kneller.

With mortal hatred I pursu'd his life,
Nor he, nor you, were guilty of the strife;
Nor I, but as I lov'd, yet all combin'd,
Your beauty, and my impotence of mind,
And his concurrent flame, that blew my fire;
For still our kindred souls had one desire.

Dryden. Palamon & Arcite

So noble and so disinterested doth Divine love make ours, that there is nothing besides the object of that love, that we love more than our concurrents in it, perchance out of a gratitude to their assisting us, to pay a debt (of love and praise) for which, alas! we find our single selves but too insolvent.—Boyle. Works, vol. I. p. 277.

In like manner, those three hypostacies, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, are not only, congenerous and coessential, as having all the essence of the Godhead alike in them, but also as concurrently making one entire Divinity.

Cudworth. Intellectual System, p. 619

[This] so afflicted her [Cromwell's daughter] that it was reported to have been one cause of her death, which happened soon after, with the concurrence of an ulcer in her womb.—Ludlow. Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 149.

We are to trust firmly in the Deity, but so as not to forget that he commonly works by second causes, and admits of our endeavours with his concurrence.

Dryden. Dedication of the Duke of Guise.

But however, say they, body in general, the common basis and matter of all worlds and beings, is self-existent and eternal; which being naturally divided into innumerable little particles or atoms, eternally endued with an ingenit and inseparable power of motion, by their omnifarious concursions and combinations and coalitions, produce successively (or at once, if matter be infinite) an infinite number of worlds; and amongst the rest there arose this visible complex system of heaven and earth.—Bentley, Ser. 6.

However the love of letters growing every day stronger in him, it was found advisable to give way to his inclination of taking orders: the rather, as the seriousness of his temper and purity of his morals concurred with his unappeasable thirst of knowledge, to give the presages of future eminence in that profession.—Hurd. Life of Warburton.

The Egyptians, as we are assured by the concurrent testimony of antiquity, were amongst the first who taught that the soul surviv'd the body, and was immortal.

Warburton. Divine Legation, b. iii. s. 4.

The delight we have in such things, hinders us from shunning scenes of misery; and the pain we feel, prompts us to relieve ourselves in relieving those who suffer; and all this antecedent to any reasoning, by an instinct that works us to its own purposes without our concurrence.

Burke. On the Sublime and Beautiful, s. 15.

CONCU'SS. CONCU'SSION, n. CONCUSSA'TION. } Lat. Concutere, ussum, (con, and quatere,) to shake together.

To shake or agitate, to cause to quake or tremble.

Now when we see the most combining band,
The strongest fast'ning of society,
Law, whereon all this frame of men doth stand
Remain concussed with uncertainty.
Daniel. To Sir Thomas Egerton.

Upon every great agitation or concussion of the brain (as happeneth from a stroke, especially if the stroke be upon the eye) whereby the optic nerve suffereth any great violence, there appeareth before the eyes a certain light, which light is nothing without, but an apparition only, all that is real being the concussion or motion of the parts of that nerve, from which experience we may conclude, that apparition of light is nothing but motion within.
Hobbs. Human Nature, c. 2.

Like ships in a storm, every one alone hath enough to do to out-ride it; but when they meet, besides the evils of the storm, they find the intolerable calamity of their mutual concussion.—Bp. Taylor. On Original Sin. Deus Justificatus.

Envy in the bosom is like a subterraneous fire shut up in the bowels of the earth, which after some astonishing concussation breaks furiously out with noise and horrour.
Bp. Hall. The Peacemaker, s 8.

How can that concussion of atoms be capable of begetting those internal and vital affections, that self-consciousness and those other powers and energies that we feel in our minds, seeing they only strike upon the outward surfaces, they cannot inwardly pervade one another, they cannot have any penetration of dimensions and conjunction of substance.—Bentley, Ser. 2.

The islands are almost every where surrounded by reefs, which appear to be rude and broken, as some violent concussion would naturally leave the solid substance of the earth.—Cook. Voyage, vol. i. b. i. c. 16.

CONDE'MNING, n.

Fr. Condemner; It. Condannare; Sp. Condenar, (con, and damnare.) Vossius says from Damnum, and damnum from Δαπανη, sumptus, impendium. — Varro, (lib. iv.) Damnum, a demtione. Quinctilian, however, remarks;—Damnum esse amissionem eorum, quæ habueris; and further;—mihi ex hoc, quod plerisque criminibus pecuniæ pœna imponebatur, appellatio etiam Damnatio videtur, (See Vossius.) The root, as Tooke is of opinion, is the A. S. Deman, to deem; (dema, judex, demm, damnatio, doom.) In Matt. v. 21, the Gr. Κρισις, Lat. Judicium; A. S. and Eng. Dome or doom, are used emphatically. Ὁς δ' αν φονευση, ενοχος εσται τη κρισει, "Thou shalt not kill, and whoever shall kill shall be in danger of the judgment;" the damnum, the doom, the judgment; the loss or punishment (Quinct. pœna) to which any one is judged, sentenced, doomed, or damned.

To condemn,—is to deem, think, or judge, (se.) any one to be guilty, to be criminal; to give judgment or sentence, or doom, of guilt; to adjudge or declare the penalty or punishment; to censure, blame, reprehend, reprove.

And if ye wisten what it is I wole mersy and not sacrifice: ye schulden never have condempned ynocentis.
Wiclif. Matthew, c. 12.

Wherefore if ye had wist what this saying meaneth: I require mercye & not sacrifice: ye would neuer haue condemned innocents.—Bible, 1551. Ib.

Therefore as bi the gift of oon into alle men into condempnacioun, so bi the rightwysnesse of oon into alle men into iustifiyng of lyf.—Wiclif. Romayns, c. 5.

After many examinations, at last they condemned him [Tyndall] by virtue of the emperour's decree made in the assembly at Ausbrough, and shortly after brought him forth to the place of execution, and there tyed him to a stake, where with a feruent zeale and a loud voice he cried, Lord, open the eyes of the King of England.—Tyndall. Life by Fox.

The condempnation or punishment, is either to reduce hym that erreth into the traine of vertue, or to preserue a multitude fro domage, by puttynge men in feare, that be prone to offende, dreding the sharpe correctiō, that they behold another to suffer.—Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. ii. c. 9.

What then shall I thinke to be the cause why they proceeded against me with this their bull condemnatorie, so vaine, so ridiculous, so trifling, but only their meere blockishnesse, whereby they seeing my allegations to be true and not able to abide, nor yet to confute the same, thought to terrifie me with their vain railing of their rotten parchment.
Fox. Martyrs. Answere of Luther to the Pope's Bull, p. 1170.

Then she the senses checks, which oft do err,
And even against their false reports decrees;
And oft she doth condemn what they prefer;
For with a pow'r above the sense she sees.
Davies. Immortality of the Soul, s. 1.

My lord the king salutes you, and commands
That to his ayde you bring your ready bands,
Or else he sweares by him that sits on high,
Before the armies ioyne, your sonne shall die.
At this the lord stood like a man that heares
The judge's voice, that condemnation bears.
Beaumont. Bosworth Field.

The Bishop of Carlile neuerthelesse was by the king's clemency preserued alive after the condemnatory sentence.
Speed. Hen. IV. an. 1400.

He that hath wisdome to be truly religious, cannot be condemnedly a fool.—Feltham, pt. i. Res. 49.

Dal. Since thou determinest weakness for no plea
In man or woman, though to thy own condemning,
Hear what assaults I had, what snares besides,
What sieges girt me round ere I consented.
Milton. Samson Agonistes.

If no liberty were allowed under pain of death for any to say, that they were sent from God, how was it possible for the Messias ever to appear, and not to be condemned? for the expectation of him was, that he should be a great person immediately sent from God, for the delivery of his people.
Stillingfleet, vol. i. Ser. 6.

And there is no reason why it should be allowable to eat broth, for instance, in a consumption, and be condemnable to feed upon it to maintain health.
Boyle. Works, s. 6. Ref. 3.

For a life led in opposition to the plain practical rules of Christianity, or without that fruit, which Christianity requires, are either of them a sufficient cause of our condemnation.—Atterbury, vol. iii Ser. 11.

Which reply [Jer. xl. 5.] being made by him of his own accord, and without any command; shows plainly that the word [Amen] ought not there to have been rendered, as in the form of a severe condemnatory prayer, So be it; but, as a form of acquiescence only in God's righteous sentence, Even so O Lord, righteous and true are thy judgments.
Clarke, vol. ii. Ser. 173.

A foolish thing it is indeed to be one's own accuser and condemner, yet such a fool is every swearer: insomuch that I do not think myself bound to believe any thing that such a man swears: for he that will swear, he sure will lie.
Beveridge, vol. ii. Ser. 97.

When Christ asked the woman, "Hath no man condemned thee?" he certainly spoke, and was understood by the woman to speak, of a legal and judicial condemnation; otherwise, her answer, "No man, Lord," was not true. In every other sense of condemnation, as blame, censure, reproof, private judgment, and the like, many had condemned her, all those indeed who brought her to Jesus.
Paley. Moral Philosophy, b. iii. pt. iii.

Fr. Condenser; Sp. Condensar; It. Condensare; Lat. Condensare, (con, and densus.) See DENSE.

To thicken, to compress or compact into a close mass; into a smaller space.

With flame condens'd thou dost thy jewels fix
And solid colours in it mix,
Flora herself envies to see
Flowers fairer than her own, and durable as she.
Cowley. Hymn to Light.

——— In what shape they choose,
Dilated or condens'd, bright or obscure,
Can execute their aerie purposes,
And works of love or enmity fulfill.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. i.

For the waters above the firmament, are the waters in the air above us, where the same is more solid and condense, which God separated from the neather waters by a firmament, that is, by an extended distance and vast space.
Raleigh. History of the World, b. i. c. 1. s. 8.

In brief, 'tis the small measure, and this, only of aiery, emptie piety, that hath puft up the man. As they say a little critical learning makes one proud; if there were more, it would condensate and compact itself into less room.
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 611.

Anaximenes supposeth that the rainbow is occasioned by the sun shining full against a grosse, thick, and black cloud, in such sort, as his beams be not able to pierce and strike thorow, by reason that they turn again upon it and become condensate.—Holland. Plutarch, p. 678.

The element of the fire, I make no doubt, but by condensation it sometimes loses to the aire, & the aire again by rarefaction to it.—Hakewill. Apologie, p. 31.

Now, this agent meeting with resistance in the moveable, and not being in the utmost extremity of density, but condensable yet further, the parts of the mover, that are to overcome this resistance in the moveable, must (to work that effect) be condens'd, and brought together as close as is needful.—Digby. Of Bodies, c. 9.

When the cold approacheth, and by condensing, drives the vapours into clouds or drops, then is way made for the sunbeams, till the same vapours, being by further condensation, formed into rain, fall down in drops.
Derham. Physico-Theology, c. 3. Note 1.

When from his lips the fatal name burst out,
A sudden pause th' imperfect sense suspended,
Like the dread stillness of condensing storms.
Johnson. Irene, Act ii. sc 3.

For this reason I never think myself qualified to judge decisively of any man's faculties, whom I have only known in one degree of elevation; but take some opportunity of attending him from the cellar to the garret, and try upon him all the various degrees of rarefaction and condensation, tension and laxity.—Rambler, No. 117.

To come down, or descend from any station or rank, eminence, or superiority; to come down or descend to a level, to an equality with another; to submit or yield; to assent or agree; to comply, to acquiesce. In Scotch, it is equivalent to the vulgar English expression,—to light upon, to pitch upon.

And whan that he on hire was condescended,
Him thought his chois it might not bin amended.
Chaucer. The Marchantes Tale, v. 9479.

And by that same reson thinketh me

And maken of hire walking sone an ende.
Id. The Squieres Tale, v. 10,721.

Vpō the euyn of All Seyntes, or the last day of October, it was condyscendid by the lordis spirituall & tēporall, & by ye hole auctorytie of the sayd parliamēt, yt Kyng Hēry shuld contynue & reygne as kynge durynge his naturall lyfe.
Fabyan, an. 1361.

Hereupon he went aboord the other ship to make peace, but they would hear no reason, neither yet condescend to restore any thing else which they had of ours.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. iii. p. 198.

All parties willingly condiscended hereunto, & it hath euer sithence beene accordingly obserued.
Carew. Survey of Cornwall, fol. 88.

But if ye please that I your cause decide,
Perhaps I may all further quarrell end,
So ye will sweare my judgment to abide.
Thereto they both did franckly condiscend
And to his doome with listfull eares did both attend.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. v. c. 1

Then (after needfulnesse of food) I first of all disclos'd
The royall cause of our repaire; mou'd you and your great friend,
To consort our renown'd designs; both straight did condescend.
Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. xi.

'Tis true indeed what Aristotle observes in his μηχανικα, that the every-day wonders are the greatest, the perfectest miracles those that by commonness have lost all their veneration; and yet this queen [the seventh day] of most familiar condescendings, is content to be oure very week's prospect.
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 525.

And asking therefore of himself wee de swetuke, how then seems he to have commanded it, he answers συγκαταβασιν, by condescending only, and submitting himself into humane infirmity, now this συγκαταβασις, this condescending of God, wherein it consisted, Oecumenius opens.
Hales. Rem. Ser. John, xviii. 36

——— Yet he
Though by this condescent new raies he set
In nature's crown, still thought himself in debt.
Beaumont. Psyche, c. 12. s. 161.

If wee be poore in spirit, God is rich in mercy; hee cannot send us away empty; yet he will not alwaies let us feele his condescent; crossing us in our will that he may advance our benefit.—Bp. Hall. Cont. The Faithful Canaanite.

Upon the comfortable feeling of a gracious condescent, follows an happy fruition of God in all his favours.
Id. The Devout Soul, s. 20.

If she [virtue] step out into zeal, satirical rebuke, and contestation, it is a condescent and debasement for the present.—H. More. Defence of the Moral Cabbala, c. 3.

Puller. Moderation of the Church of England

The excellency of these precepts is very apparent, in the greatness of their condescention, the spiritualty of their nature, the majesty of the rewards annexed to them, and as Christ hath recommended them to us by his own example.
Grew. Cosmo. Sacra, b. v. c. 5.

Not starting of high and intricate questions, and concluding them by subtle arguments, but familiarly and condescendingly setting out the creation according to the most easie and obvious conceits, they themselves had of those things they saw in the world
H. More. The Defence of Cabbala, Introd. § 5.

Go heav'nly guest, ethereal messenger,

The respect and condescendency which you have already shown me is that, for which I can never make any suitable return.—Boyle. Works, vol. vi. p. 610. Let. from Dr. Avery.

Was it not an astonishing condescension for the greatest prince in the world to make his first entrance upon earth in no nobler a guise and appearance, than as the son of a poor maid espoused to a carpenter, and to take up his first lodging in no better a place than a manger?—Sharp, vol v. Ser. 4.

There is not the least of the Divine favours, which, if we consider the condescension tenderness, the clear intention, the undeserved frankness, the cheerful debonairity expressed therein, hath not dimensions larger than our comprehension, colours too fair, and lineaments too comely for our weak sight thoroughly to discern.—Barrow, vol. i. Ser. 8.

They were offended, some of them at least, because he did not live in a way more austere, and in their opinion more becoming the dignity, which he assumed, because he condescended to converse with people of bad reputation, with publicans and sinners.—Jortin. On the Christ. Relig. Dis. 1.

We love virtue;—because of the amiableness and condescendency of such a disposition and inclination of heart.
Edwards. On the Will, pt. iv. s. 1.

We should often consider (what few of us do consider) that we have wrongnesses in our own dispositions, and that if we are displeased with an opposition to our humours, we ought to shew a condescension to the humours of others
Gurnall, vol i. ser 9.

And after it was vsed that kynges of Englande whanne they were crowned, sente, for an offerynge, their crownes vnto Seynt Edmûde's shryne, and redemed theym afterwardes with a condygne pryce.—Fabyan, vol. i. c. 200.

God must then of his righteousnes ordeine a place of purgatory, wher his soule shall haue a further punishment to make a condigne and full satisfaction for that sinne, and so to bee purged and purified before it shal be able and woorthy to be admitted to receaue the eternall ioye in heauen.
Rastell, in Frith. Workes, p. 16.

For he that for euery lyttel occasion is moued with compassion, and beholdynge a man punyshed condygnely for his offence, lamenteth or waylethe, is called pitiouse, which is a sycknesse of the mynde.
Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. ii. c. 7.

In this case of the Abbot of Rywax, the other commissioners proceeded according to the law, and your credence by me to them related; and condignly have removed from the rule of his abbacy, and administration of the same.
Strype. Memorials. Legh to Cromwell, an. 1536.

And herein they so enwrap themselves with their termes of the first grace, the second grace, grace precedent, grace concomitant, grace following, with merit of congruence and merit of condignity; that they neither understand the true justification, neither can other men understand what they do mean by their justification.

Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. vii. c. 6.

It is as strange that those of your side should aver that the good works of those that are remote, should out of condignity merit heaven (which is far beyond all that this world can administer) and yet give it under their own hands that they are not worthy governments terrene and finite.
Feltham. On the Low Countries, Let. 17.

And since that neither wealth nor want
To goodness may thee win,
A grievous death, condignly shall
Cut off thy grounded sinne.
Warner. Albion's England, b. ii. c. 11.

The mouths of the common people were now full of murmurings upon the king's continual wasting sickness, and many forbare not to talk broadly against some, of using unfair ways for dispatching the king out of the world, on whom condign vengeance was taken
Strype. Memorials. Edw. VI an. 1553.

Though there be nothing of casuality, nothing of condignity, nothing of merit in it; yet there is such a congruity and fitness in it to qualify a man for pardon, for God hath appointed it as the only means whereby to obtain it
Bp Beveridge, vol. ii. Ser. 87.

It is his majesty's express will and pleasure, that you do take every step authorized by law to bring all such heinous offenders to the most exemplary and condign punishment.—Mr. Secretary Pitt. To the Governors, &c. in North America, Aug. 24, 1760.

CONDI'TIONATE, v.
CONDI'TIONATE, adj.
CONDI'TIONED.

The state in which things are put or placed together; the qualities or attributes, or properties, of persons or things, whether good or bad, general or particular, accidental or inherent, physical or moral; the whole or partial circumstances, under which any thing is done or required to be done; is agreed or covenanted, bargained or stipulated to be done.

Conditional,—under the power or force of conditions, or of things or circumstances to be done or required to be done; of terms stipulated or agreed upon; governed, regulated, limited, qualified; by such circumstances or terms.

I rede in a cronicle thus
Of Galba, and of Vitellius,
The whiche of Spayne both were
The greatest of all other there,
And both of a condicion
After the disposicion
Of glotony and dronkship. Gower. Con. A. b. vi.

And yet we maye vowe (saith he) to do a thynge but for one tyme, and upon a condycyon also. Here he tymeth and condycyoneth with God whiche approueth nothyng.
Bale. Apologie, fol. 69.

Let euery man haue his wyfe, and thinke her the fayrest and the best conditioned, and euery woman her husband so to.—Tyndall. Works, p. 205.

Diuers not beyng of good order and policie, we haue seene conuersant a great while in Rome onely for beyng ill-conditioned.—Golden Boke, c. 14.

There bee certaine men like conditioned to dogges, if there bee any man that is not their countryman, or that they loue not, or know not, say any thing agaynst them, then cry they, an heretycke, an heretycke.—Barnes. Workes, p. 207.

The traine oyles which you laded this yeere came well conditioned, and the caske was good and of a good size.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 306.

He by his procurement of his friendes returned home againe to his awne: but the nobles of the realme condicioned with him that he should reforme his olde maners.
Grafton. Egeldred. Danes.

And it is oftentymes seen that dyuers, whiche before they came in autorite, were of good & virtuous condicions, being in their prosperitie were vtterly changed, and despising their olde frendes, set all their study and pleasure on their new acquaintance.—Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. ii. c. 11.

And this noble knight, Sir Johan Chandos, lyued nat after his hurte past a day and a nyght, but so dyed, God haue mercy on his soule: for in a hundred yere after, there was nat a more curteose, nor more fuller of noble vertues, and good condycions amonge the Inglyssshmen than he was

Nothwithstanding one thing I must put you in remembraunce, that you haue falsly translated the text, for the text hath not that conditional, although I was contented to take it at your handes to see what you could proue.
Frith, Workes, p. 71.

Likewise person for person, number for number, and interrogatiõ for a conditionall, and such lyke is with the Hebrues a common vsage.—Tyndall. Workes, p. 32.

But this offre was conditionally, so that the whole agreement toke effecte, or else not.—Hall. Hen. VIII. an. 17.

Small towns which stand stiff, till great shot
Enforce them, by war's law condition not.
Donne. Love's Exchange.

It may be that consideration of tyme, place, state, condition, and other circumstances, hath altered some of them in some poynts, as wise (and yet will'all) men in such matters by such circumstances be oftentimes altered.
Whitgift. Defence, p. 780.

Fond man, that looks on earth for happiness,
And here long seeks what here is never found,
For all our good we hold from heaven by lease,
With many forfeits and conditions bound.
P. Fletcher. The Purple Island, c. 7.

And, oh, what man's condition can be worse
Than his whom plenty starves and blessings curse?
The beggars but a common fate deplore,
The rich poor man's emphatically poor.
Cowley. Ess. Of Avarice.

Hee [Sir William Stanley] had said; that if hee were sure, that young man were king Edward's sonne, he would neuer beare armes against him. This case seemes somewhat an hard case, both in respect of the conditionall, and in respect of the other wordes. But for the conditionall it seemeth the iudges of that time (who were learned men, and the three chief of them of the priuy councell) thought it was a dangerous thing to admit ifs and ands, to qualifie words of treason; whereby euery man might expresse his malice, and blanch his danger.—Bacon. Hen. VII. p. 134.

And as this clear proposal of the promises may inspirit our endeavours, so is the conditionality most efficacious to necessitate and engage them.—Decay of Piety.

Do they ever expect this beloved remission by performing the condition of repentance? Do we ever go about to make ourselves capable of receiving this mercy conditionally offer'd us?—Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 673.

Yet some write, that King William granted Cumberland to Malcolme King of Scots, to hold from him conditionally, that the Scots should not attempt any thing prejudicial to the crown of England, for which grant King Malcolme did him homage.—Baker. William I. an. 1076.

So is it usual amongst us to qualifie and conditionate the twelve months of the year answerably unto the temper of the twelve days in Christmas.—Brown. Vul. Err. b. vi. c. 4.

Deborah had been no prophetesse, if she durst have sent in her own name; her message is from him that sent herselfe, Hath not the Lord God of Israel commanded? Barac's answer is faithfull, though conditionate, and doth not so much intend a refusal to goe without her, as a necessary bond of her presence with him.
Bp. Hall. Cont. Josi & Sacra.

To which purpose you must again remember, that God's promises being the ground of hope, and those promises being but seldom absolute, most what conditionate, the hope (if it be Christian grace of hope) must be proportioned and attemperate to the promise.—Hammond. Works, vol. i. p. 17.

The other, with much face and little shame, saith both of Martyr and Bucer, that at their first coming into England, they were conditioned with to teach the religion, whatsoever it were, that should be established in the parliament approaching.—Strype. Memorials. Edw. VI. an. 1548.

So gentle of condition was he known,
That through the court his courtesy was blown:
All think him worthy of a greater place,
And recommend him to the royal grace;
That exercis'd within a higher sphere,
His virtues more conspicuous might appear.
Dryden. Palamon & Arcite.

But the Ninevites did not reason thus, but urged after another manner; who can tell, say they, but God will return and repent, and turn away from his fierce anger, that we perish not [Jonah] ch. iii. v. 9 they believed God's decree to be conditional.—Sharp Works, vol. vi. Ser. 5.

Would God in mercy dispense with it as a conditionary, yet we could not be happy without it, as a natural qualification for heaven.—Norris.

Whilst the church of Christ was subject to insults and persecution from the Pagan powers, and in a low and distressed condition, the Christians assembled together as often as they could, and took all possible care to instruct, and animate, and comfort, and relieve one another.
Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History.

Every covenant of God with man, on the system of God's revealed will, is a covenant of grace or favour; which therefore may be justly made (as in fact it is made) with this conditional punishment annexed and declared.
Warburton. Works, vol. ix. Ser. 7.

The loss, indeed, was immense; but to the loser no wrong was done: and of him who recalled the free gift conditionally bestowed, and justly forfeited, no complaint, in reason, can be made.—Hurd. Works, vol. vii. ser. 30.

To our deare sister and Melpomene,
That she her sweet pathetick voice may frame
In doleful dittie to condole the same.
Mirrour for Magistrates, p 783.

Her. I come not, Samson, to condole thy chance
As these perhaps, yet wish it had not been,
Though for no friendly intent.—Milton. Samson Agonist.

——— But to persever
In obstinate condolement, is a course
Of impious stubbornesse. 'Tis vnmanly greefe,
It shewes a will most incorrect to heauen.
Shakespeare. Hamlet, Act i. sc. 2.

Like that doubty Centurion Afranius in Lucian; who, to imitate the noble Pericles in his Epitaphian Speech, stepping up after to bewail the slain Severanus, falls into a pitiful condolement to think of those costly suppers, and drinking banquets which he must now taste no more.
Milton. Animad. upon Remonstrants' Defence.

Thy blessed mother, and those other zealous associates of her owne sexe, were most passionate in their wailings; and why should I think, that all that devout multitude, which so lately cried Hosanna in the streets did not also beare their part in these publique condolings?
Bp. Hall Cont. The Crucifixion.

He [Sir W. Raleigh] was abiding in the Temple in Apr. 1576, at which time his vein for ditty and amorous ode was esteemed most lofty, condolent and passionate.
Wood. Athenæ Oxon.

Their songs are very melancholy and doleful, so is their musick but whether it be natural to the Indians to be thus melancholy, or the effect of their slavery, I am not certain: but I have always been prone to believe, that they are then only condoling their miserable state, the loss of their country and liberties.—Dampier. Voyage, an 1684.

Her congratulation and condoleances are equally words of course, and one would be thought wonderful ill bred, that should build upon such expressions as encouragements, to expect from them any instance of friendship
Tatler, No. 109.

To Thebes the neighb'ring princes all repair,
And with condolence the misfortune share.
Croxall. Ovid. Metam.

——— By his side fast laid,
I press'd his hand in mine, and on it dropp'd
The tear of sad condolence. Brooke. Conrade.

CONDONATION. Lat. Condonare, atum, which signifies, says Gesner, the same as donare, with some augmentation; sometimes also remittere, non exigere, quod debetur; and thus—
To forgive, to pardon.

Now I professed at first, to take justification only in this acceptation, and inferred thereupon against the gagger, no more than was enough to confute him and his, and we teach and believe, that when sinnes are pardoned by God, God doth not change the mind of the sinner, neyther yet destroyeth in him the blot and body of sinne, but that the same, remaining in the soule of man, in like maner as it did before condonation, is only taken away by a not imputation of the guilt.—Mountagu. Appeale to Cæsar, p. 163.

They that infect a prince or king with wicked counsail, are not they more wicked enchaunters, considering thei do as much, as if one should poyson a conduite head, or a river from whence all men fetch their water.
Wilson. Arte of Rhetorike, p. 127.

As if works could no way conduce into the attaining of salvation but by way of merit and desert, and not by way of grace and favour of God in Christ.
Mede. Works, b. i. Dis. 40.

And yet, for all this, shee shall go; if more conducible
That course be, than her holding here. I rather wish the weale
Of my lov'd armie then the death.
Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. i.

Which two contemplations are not inferiour to any for either pleasantness in themselves or conducibleness for the finding out of the right frame of nature.
More. Song of the Soul, Pref.

At Jove's broad beech these godheads met, and first Jove's aonne objects,
Why, burning in contention thus, doe thy extreame affects Conduct thee from our peaceful hill? Is it to oversway
The doubtful victory of fight, and give the Greeks the day?
Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. viii.

Through little vents and crannies of the place
The wind wars with his torch, to make him stay,
And blows the smoke of it into his face,
Extinguishing his conduct in this case.

Open and bare-faced knavery, rarely serves a man's turn in this world; but it is under the mask of virtue and honesty that it usually performs those feats it doth; which is no less than a demonstration of the conduciveness of those things, to promote our temporal interests.—Sharp, vol. i. Ser. 8.

Did my return bring comfort to her sorrow?
Then haste, conduct me to the lovely mourner.
Smith. Phædra & Hippolitus.

Many other instances, like these, there are, wherein I say, we shall never be able to give ourselves a satisfactory account of the Divine conduct, as it appears to us at present, without drawing our arguments and reflexions from a future state, and forming such a scheme of things, as shall at once take in both time and eternity.—Atterbury, vol. ii. Ser. 10.

The Holy Spirit is described in the New Testament, as the immediate author and worker of all miracles, even of those done by our Lord himself; and as the conducter of Christ in all the actions of his life, during his state of humiliation here upon earth.—Clarke. On the Trinity, s. 28.

God is the fountain of honour, and the conduct, by which he conveys it to the sons of men, are virtuous and generous practices.—South, vol i. Ser. 5.

All agree, that Moses' main end was the abolition of idolatry, and preservation of the unity. The institution of the sabbath is shewn by Spenser and others to be, of all the ceremonial, the very rite most conducive to this end.

Now had night measur'd with her shadowie cone
Half way up hill this vast sublunar vault.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. iv.

As therefore each side of an arch descendeth alike from the coane or top point; so both the parts of that their government was alike deduced from the king, each of them holding correspondency one with the other (like two loving sisters) both in aspect, and in lineaments.
Spelman. Of the Ancient Government of England.

Foure grisly blacksmiths stoutly did their task
Upon an anvile form'd in conick wise.
They neither minded who, nor what I ask,
But with stern grimy look do still avise
Upon their works.—More. On the Soul, pt. I. b. iii. c. 6.

But the illiterate people troubled themselves with no such curiosities, nor easily conceived any such difference betwixt that determinate conical shadow of the earth, which is night, and that infinite primitive darkness that had no bounds before there was any light.
Id. Defence of the Literal Cabbala, c. 1.

Say, Aleiphron, are the lakes, the rivers, or the ocean bounded by straight lines? Are the hills and mountains exact cones or pyramids?

That for the defence of the league, the king shall pay one hundred thousand crownes, whereof the one haife the confederatours shall and maye employ when needs shall require, and the rest of their charges to be borne of their awne money, which they shall contribute among them.
Grafton. Hen. VIII. an. 26.

So for purpose she thought it very good
With former foes in friendship to confeder.
Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 337.

It was thought and spoken also abroad, but the first author would not be known, That they had conspired together, not for the present time onely to doe wrong and injurie, but also were confedered betweene themselves privily, yea and had bound it with an oath, to call no assembly at all for the electing of newe magistrates.—Holland. Livie, p. 112

Edward [son of Hen. III.] being thus escaped, gathereth an armie, confederateth and submitteth to him the countries of Hereford, Worcester, Salop, and Chester.
Stow. Hen. III. an. 1265.

Whereat Coute all appalled, answered, And thou shalt die for thy desert, when as thou art a traitour to God and me, in killing thy king, and my confederate brother.
Camden. Remains. Wise Speeches.

Beside his pris'ner Mortimer he gain'd,
From being a foe, to be his confederate;
A man the king much fear'd—and well he might,
Lest he should look whether his crown stood right.
Daniel. Civil Wars, b. iv.

It is not a single star, but like a constellation, and particularly as the Pleiades, where one of the seven hath almost no light or visibility, though knit in the same confederation with those which half the world do at one time see.
Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. iii. c. 6.

Northumberland recover'd still outstands;
The principal of this great family
And faction: having Berwick in his hands,
With other holds: strong by confed'racy
With Scotland, mighty by his own command.
Daniel. Civil Wars, b

There went a talk, that the emperor would forget and forgive all unto Marquis Albright (who was the chief of the German Protestants that confederated with France, and made havoc in the emperor's countries) and rather reward him with good livings besides, to win him from the French king's devotion.—Strype. Memorials. Edw. VI. an. 1552.

Thus man innumerous engines forms, t'assail
The savage kind, but most the docile horse,
Swift and confederate with man, annoys
His brethren of the plains.—Somervile. Chace.

It is a confederating with him to whom the sacrifice is offered.—Atterbury.

We find nothing like a combination among the apostles, as to matters of doctrine; and if there had been it would have rendered the faith they delivered more suspicious, in that they durst not trust particular persons with delivery of it, without an antecedent confederacy among themselves.
Stillingfleet, vol. iv. Ser. 2.

To him therefore she applieth, terrified by the tumultuous noise of confederated nations, roaring against her like the roaring of the sea, and "lifting up their heads," as so many monsters of the deep to devour her at once.
Bp. Horne. On the Psalms, Ps. 83.

He is the freeman, whom the truth makes free,
And all are slaves beside. There's not a chain,
That hellish foes confed'rate for his harm
Can wind around him but he casts it off,
With as much ease as Samson his green withes.
Cowper. Task, b. v.

When afterwards the Greeks, by frequent confederations against the Persians, the common enemy of their liberties, began to consider themselves as one people and community, the mysteries were extended to all who spoke the Greek language.—Warburton. Divine Legation, b. ii. s. 4.

The Grecian Commonwealth, while they maintained their liberty, were the most heroic confederacy that ever existed, they were the politest, the bravest, and the wisest of men.

Fox. Martyrs. Articles administ. to A. Wellis, an. 1521.

Wake, wake thy long, thy too long sleeping Muse
And thank them with a song, as is the use:
Such honour, thus conferr'd, thou mayst not well refuse.
P. Fletcher. The Purple Island, c. 1.

Onely I draw out certain diversities of readings, and many corrections by conferring the old written copies with the printed books: which have stood me in great stead of the understanding of many hard places.
North. Plutarch, Pref. p. 6.

Conferre the debt and the paiment, Christ and Adam, sin and the cure of it, the disease and the medicine.
Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 708.

Their counsels therefore and conferences about this matter, which heretofore they held dispersed here and there, and projected oftentimes by two and three in a company, they now complotted altogether.—Holland. Suetonius, p. 31.

You have not any where answered directly to any of this, and to the most of it, and diuer other things included betwixt the 151 page and 171. you haue not answered one woorde which the reader by conference may vnderstand.
Whitgift. Defence, p. 715.

Thus physically quencht they thirst, and then their spirits revived
With pleasant conference.—Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. xi.

Thus when with meats and drinks they had suffic'd,
Not burthen'd nature, sudden mind arose
In Adam, not to let th' occasion pass
Given him by this great conference to know
Of things above this world.—Milton. Paradise Lost, b. v.

When we are upon the receipt of commendations from kind conferrers of them, we must be advised in taking somewhat lesse of them upon the account of our benefe, then is offered us.—Mountague. Devout Ess. Tr. 10. § 4.

The common method of God's providence is to suffer all his creatures to act according to the powers, which he hath conferred upon their natures, and accordingly having endued mankind with liberty and choice, so as that they may do well or do ill, he permits them to exercise those powers, though oftentimes they employ them to ill purposes.
Sharp, vol. vi. Ser. 1.

A free conference is indeed the only fair trial of skill between reason and sophistry; it is a sort of Cornish wrestling; the competitors grapple upon even terms, and without compliment, they exchange the close hug as soon as possible, and the victory is visible to all the spectators.
Hoadly. Letters signed Britannicus, Let. 59.

I esteem the encomiums you conferred upon me in the senate, together with your congratulatory letter, as a distinction of the highest and most illustrious kind.
Melmoth. Cicero, b. vi. Let. 10.

But this important enterprise demands
More secret conference.—Smollet. Regicide, Act ii. sc. 7.

Our foes themselues confest they bought full deere,
The hote pursute which they attempted there.
Gascoigne. The Fruites of Warre.

Then aboute mydnight he layde hym downe to rest, and in the mornynge he rose betymes, and harde masse, and the prince his sonne with hym, and the most part of his company were confessed and houseled.
Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. i. c. 128.

They haue fained confession for the same purpose to stablish theyr kyngdom with all. All secrets know they thereby. The bishop knoweth the confession of whom he lusteth throughout all his dioces.—Tyndall. Workes, p. 180.

It is true, quod the kynge; name them that be mete to go on that voyage. Sir, quod they, sende your confessour, frere Fernādo of Farre, and the byshoppe of Geghene, who was sometyme confessour to the kynge your father, and Peter Gardelopes, who is well languaged.
Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. ii. c. 129.

Her breath so sweetly smell'd,
The violets, as excell'd,
To looke down were compell'd:
And so confest what foile they did receaue.
Sterling. Aurora, s. 7.

Much haue we sinned, to our shame:
But spare us, who our sins confess;
And for the glory of thy name
To our sick souls afford redress.
Drummond. Upon the Sundays in Lent. Hymn.

In probabilities, I prefer that which is the more reasonable, and never allowing to any one a leave of choosing that which is confessedly the less reasonable in the whole conjunction of circumstances and relative considerations.
Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, Pref.

And this confession flew from every voyce,
Never had land more reason to rejoyce,
Nor to her blisse, could ought new added bee,
Save that she might the same perpetuall see.
B. Jonson. A Panegyre on King James, an. 1603.

What should I speake here of my dailie reuenues, of my first fruites, annates, palles, indulgences, bulls, confessionals, and such like, which come to no small masse of money.
Fox. Martyrs. Hen. VII. Cases Papal, p. 738.

By a missive, from a papist I am sure, and I suppose from a priest, I was not long since forced upon the controversies of these times, betweene the Protestant and Romish confessionists.—Mountagu. Appeale to Cæsar, Epist. Ded.

——— With him we likewise seat
The sumptuous shrined king, good Edward from the rest
Of that renowned name, by Confessor express'd.
Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 24.

For can any thing be said to have so much as a shew of wisdom or piety in respect of will-worship in it, if that will-worship thus pretended, pass confestly either for foolish or impious?—Hammond. Works, vol. i. p 283.

Which by the way lays a very ill character upon those, who by pretence of Christianity or piety, seek or claim to themselves any other liberty than what by the laws under which they are born, doth confestly belong unto them.
Id. Ib. p. 332.

To confess our sins, is to own with shame and confusion of face, that we have transgressed the righteous laws of God, and deserved his wrath and displeasure, and so far to dislike, to disapprove, and to detest our own actions, that we severely purpose never to be guilty of the like again.
Sharp, vol. v. Ser. 6.

I confess it raises my scorn and indignation at this mushroome scribbler; to see him by and by with an air of superiority prescribing to the whole body of your clergy, the true method of quoting Cicero.—Bentley. Of Free-thinking.

The temperate and moderate enjoyment of all the good things of this present world, and of the pleasures of life, according to the measures of right reason and simple nature; is plainly and confessedly the certainest and most direct method, to preserve the health and strength of the body.
Clarke. On Nat. and Rev. Religion, Prop. 4.

There is a wide difference between a mere confitent and a true penitent.—Decay of Piety.

When we speak of confession of our sins as a means of obtaining pardon for them, we mean by it such an actual attention to our sins, and to our guilt, and such an hearty acknowledgment thereof to God Almighty, as includes in it both shame and sorrow for what we have done, and likewise steadfast purpose of heart to do so no more.
Sharp, vol. v. Ser. 6.

To this sagacious confessour [his wife] he went
And told her what a gift the gods had sent;
But told it under matrimonial seal,
With strict injunctions never to reveal.
Dryden. The Wife of Bath's Tale.

Josephus says that Antiochus Epiphanes, as he was dying confessed that he suffered for the injuries which he had done to the Jews.—Jortin. On the Christian Religion, Dis. 1.

In Peru I [Acosta] have seen an Indian bring to the confessorni a confession of all his sins written in the same way, by picture and characters, portraying every one of the ten commandments after a certain manner.
Warburton. The Divine Legation, b. iv. s. 4.

Such is my name, and such my tale.
Confessor! to thy secret ear,
I breathe the sorrows I bewail,
And thank thee for the generous tear
This glazing eye could never shed.
Lord Byron. The Giaour.

Fr. Confier; It. Confidarsi; Sp. Confiarse; Lat. Confidere, (con, and fidere, to have fay-eth or faith, to trust.)

To have or place faith or trust in; to credit or give credit; to trust or believe, to be secure or assured, to rely or depend upon; to be firmly, boldly secure.

Who can haue confidens in him which putteth diffidens in all mē.—Hall. Rich. III. an. 3.

The duke although, that he had small confidence, but rather great diffidence, in the othe and promise of Monsire de Vaudere: thought it necessary to knowe, in what case Calcis stede, & what mutacions wer there.
Id. Edw. IV. an. 9.

And these last wordes he would often repeate, with demonstration of great feruencie of mind, being himself very confident, and setled in beliefe of inestimable good by this voyage.—Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. iii. p. 159.

——— Yet not terrible,
That I should fear, nor sociably mild,
As Raphael, that I should much confide,
But solemn, whom not to offend,
With reverence I must meet, and thou retire.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. xi.

Yet because outward storms the strongest break,
And strength itself by confidence grows weak,
This new world may be safer, being told
The dangers and diseases of the old
Donne. Anatomy of the World. First Anniversary.

When such an opinion makes a sect, and this sect gets firm confidents and zealous defenders, in a little time it will dwell upon the conscience as if it were a native there, whereas it is but a pitiful inmate and ought to be turned out of doors.—Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. ii. c. 2.

Tell me then, if whatsoever, ire
Suggests, in hurt of me, to him, thy valour will prevent?
Achilles answered; all thou knowest, speake and be confident. Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. i.

After hee had made choise of a companie very lightly appointed, such as for lively vigour and delivernesse of bodie surpassed all others, with them he went forth, hoping confidently for greater matters.—Holland. Ammianus, p. 117.

We shal be the less frighted when with the apostles we are going into the cloud, remembring the reproach God maketh to tottering confiders, Am I onely a God at near hand, and not the same at distance?
Mountayne. Devoute Essayes. Treat. 16. s. 5.

May she [Rome] no more confide in friends,
Who nothing farther understood,
Than only, for their private ends,
To waste her wealth, and spill her blood
Buckinghamshire. Chorusses in Marcus Brutus, c. 1.

But surely modesty never hurt any cause, and the confidence of man seems to me to be much like the wrath of man, which St. James tells us, worketh not the righteousness of God; that is, it never does any good, it never serves any wise and real purpose of religion.—Tillotson, vol. i. Ser. 44.

I dare confidently pronounce, that you will, in one month, find more joy, more peace, more content, to arise in your spirits from the sense that you have resisted the temptations of evil, and done what was your duty to do, than in many years spent in vanity and a licentious course of living.
Sharp, vol. i. Ser. 2.

Hobby being a confidant of the Protector's, he may be supposed to have written as he was directed by him.
Burnet. History of Reformation, an. 1547.

Thanks to the lovely fair ones, types of heaven,
Who raise and beautify the bounty given:
But chief to him in whom distress confides
Who o'er this noble plan so graciously presides.
Smart. Epilogue to the Conscious Lovers.

Secure of all thy love, and all thy prudence,
Returning confidence has arm'd my soul
For this dread meeting, resting on thy truth
I go— Mason. Elfrida.

Nor is it unlikely but they might get further intelligence from something drop by his confidents, the sophists, a people vain and talkative, and at no time renowned for secrecy.
Warburton. Of Julian's Attempt to rebuild the Temple.

Against all rules, after we had met nothing but rebuffs in return to all our proposals, we made two confidential communications to those in whom we had no confidence, and who reposed no confidence in us.—Burke. Reg. Peace. Let. 3.

What hath been said, I suppose, will tend to give us a different and higher notion of this extraordinary work: and lessen our surprise at the author's presumption, in so confidently predicting immortality to his performance.
Warburton. Divine Legation, b. iii. s. 3.

In this conjuncture, the nutrix, who is not drawn, as in modern tragedy, an unmeaning confidante, the mere depositary of the poet's secrets, but has real manners assigned to her, endeavours, with the highest beauty of character, to divert these horrid intentions.—Hurd. Notes on Art of Poet.

Thus the different effects, which fire and water have on us, which we call heat and cold, result from the so differing configuration and agitation of their particles.
Glanvill. Vanity of Dogmatizing, p. 88.

[It was the] opinion of the great Empedocles; That mother earth first brought forth vast numbers of legs, and arms, and heads, and other members of the body, scattered and distinct, and all at their full growth; which coming together and cementing (as the pieces of snakes and lizards are said to do if one cuts them asunder) and so configuring themselves into human shape, made lusty, proper men of thirty years age in an instant.—Bentley, Ser. 4.

I shall not, contrary to the design of this essay, set myself to enquire philosophically into the peculiar constitution of bodies and the configuration of parts; whereby they have the power to produce in us the ideas of their sensible qualities.—Locke. Hum. Underst. b. ii. c. 21.

It is the variety of configurations [of the mouth] in these openings only, which gives birth and origin to the several vowels, and hence it is they derive their name by being thus eminently vocal and easy to be sounded of themselves alone.
Harris. Hermes, b. iii. c. 2.

His kingdom confineth with the Red Sea, and reacheth far into Afrike towards Aegypt and Barbarie. Southward, it confineth with the sea towards the Cape de Bona Speranza.
Hacklugt. Voyages, vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 10.

I haue trauelled through all the ample dominions of the emperour of Russia and Moscouia, which extends from the North Sea and the confines of Norway and Lapland, even to the Mare Caspium.—Id. Ib. vol. i. p. 412.

This region confronteth the Arabians Canchlei on the east side, and the Cedrei southwards, and they both confine together afterwards upon the Nabathaei.
Holland. Plinie, b. v. c. 11.

And then the soul a substance hath alone
Besides the body in which she's confin'd;
So hath she not a body of her own,
But is a spirit, and immaterial mind
Davies. Immortality of the Soul, s. 4.

Nought save the soule which doth from God proceed,
Over death triumphs, and still is pleas'd, as pynes,
Death not mar's essence, but his sinne did breed,
And it with it, the end of time confines.
Sterling. Doomes day. The Third Houre.

But Terme which signifieth bounds is the god of confines or borders, unto whom they do sacrifice both publickly and privately, upon the limits of inheritance, and now they sacrifice unto him live beasts.—North. Plutarch, p. 59.

There is infinite virtue in the Almighty not confinable to any limits.—Bp. Hall. Rem. p. 99.

—— Blacke Macbeth
Will seeme as pure as snow; and the poor state
Esteem him as a lambe, being compar'd

And that kind laughter's treachery,
By which some virgin, closely laid
In dark confinement, is betray'd.—Sherburne. Horat.

Happy confiners you of other lands,
That shift your soil, and oft 'scape tyrants hands.
Daniel. Civil Wars, b. i.

And with such an impression of his first tincture (as falleth out naturally in all things else) that he always maintained a great interest in the Roman court; as indeed was necessary for a near and jealous confiner.—Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 244.

As for cities such as are of late foundation, and since the increase of navigation, in as much as they have had since more plenty of riches, have been walled about and built upon the shore; and have taken up Isthmi (that is to say, necks of land between sea and sea) both for merchandize, and for the better strength against confiners.
Hobbs. Thucydides, b. i.

For, where 'tis of itself inclin'd,
It breaks loose when it is confin'd,
And like the soul, its harbourer,
Debarr'd from freedom of the air,
Disdains against its will to stay,
But struggles out, and flies away.—Hudibras, pt. iii. c. 1.

Before we take into consideration the epistle to the Romans, in particular, it may not be amiss to premise,—the miraculous birth, life, death, resurrection and ascension of our Lord Jesus Christ, were all events that came to pass within the confines of Judea.—Locke. On Romans. Synopsis.

We may not affirm, that ruptures are confinable unto one side, as the peritoneum or rim of the belly may be broke, or its perforations relaxed in either.—Brown. Vulgar Errours.

That man can do wrong, arises from a weakness and not a superiour strength in him; from the imperfection of his views, and the confinedness of his powers.
Hoadly. Letters signed Britannicus, Let. 53.

We find three incompliant prelates more this year under confinement in the Tower, Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, Heath of Worcester, and Day of Chichester.
Strype. Memorials. Edw. VI. an. 1550.

Whether confirmation be a sacrament or not, it is of no use to dispute; and if it be disputed, it can never be proved to be so as baptism and the Lord's supper, that is, as generally necessary to salvation: though it be no sacrament, it cannot follow that it is not of very great use and holiness.
Bp. Taylor. On Confirmation, s. 1.

It is not improbable, that they [the disciples] had in their eye the confirmatory usage in the synagogues, to which none were admitted, before they were of age to undertake for themselves.—Bp. Compton. Episcopalia, (1686) p. 35.

The oath of a louer is no stronger than the word of a tapster, they are both the confirmers of false reckonings.

Baker. Hen. III. an. 1235.

Having espied two wealthy gentlemē of Rome passing by, he commanded them to be apprehended incontinently, and condemned in the confiscation of their goods.
Holland. Suetonius, p. 143.

The English and Dutch are never permitted, though under the greatest distress of weather, or want of provisions, to put into any of those ports; but their ships, if they come in, are constantly confiscated: and upon this very account, that, if once entrance were permitted the traffic could not but follow.—Hoadly. An Enq. into the Cond. of Gt. Britain.

But, doubtless, an innocent posterity were sometimes punished, according to the denunciation of this law, for the crimes of their wicked fathers; as is done by modern states, in attaint of blood and confiscation: and this with the highest equity in both cases.—Warburton. Div. Leg. b. v. s. 5.

The confiscators truly have made some allowance to their victims from the scraps and fragments of their own tables, from which they have been so harshly driven, and which have been so bountifully spread for a feast to the harpies of usury.—Burke. On the French Revolution.

After what has passed in 1782, one would not think that decorum, to say nothing of policy, would permit them to call up, by magick charms, the grounds, reasons, and principles of those terrible, confiscatory and exterminatory periods.

Out of their place.—More. On the Soul, pt. ii. b. iii. c. 2.

And this consideration doth so effectually support him under all the difficulties that he hath to conflict with, that he not only sits down easily and quietly, but is very well pleased with the dispensations of the Divine providence towards him, how ingrateful soever they may be to flesh and blood.—Sharp, vol. i. Ser. 5.

Even when I do not suppose good men to be under a state of persecution, yet still I suppose them to live in a state of mortification and self denial, to be under a perpetual conflict with their bodily appetites and inclinations, and struggling to get the mastery over them.
Atterbury. Sermons, vol. ii. Pref.

On the other hand, Electra borne with sundry conflicting passions, is most apparently, and in the properest notion of the word, uniform.—Hurd. Notes on the Art of Poetry.

As when some one peculiar quality
Doth so possess a man, that it doth draw
All his affects, his spirits and his powers,
In their confluxions, all to run one way,
This may be truly said to be a humour.
B. Jonson. Every Man out of his Humour, Introd.

There appeared no confluxe of men in obedience to the proclamation; the arme and ammunition were not yet come from York, and a general sadness cover'd the whole town.
Clarendon. Hist. of the Rebellion, vol. i. p. 720.

The vilest cockle, gaping on the coast
That rounds the ample seas, as well may boast,
The craggy rock projects above the sky,
That he in safety at its foot may lie;
And the whole ocean's confluent waters swell,
Only to quench his thirst, or move and blanch his shell.
Prior. Solomon. Knowledge.

I answer, the same way that the water doth: which I suppose to be by its upper superficies; the water descending by pores and passages that there it finds into chinks and veins, and by a confluence of many of them by degrees swelling into a stream, the air accompanies and follows it by a constant succession.—Ray. On the Creation, pt. i.

But notwithstanding all this guard a little before the Duke [of Somerset] died, there happened on a sudden a rumbling noise, as though it had been gunne shooting off and great horses coming; which produced a very great terror among the people, of whom there was a greater confusion than ever had been observed before on such an occasion, notwithstanding it was so early.—Strype. Mem. Edw. VI. an. 1551.

And even without any design of hers, not to say without her existence, a vacuity will be so much opposed as we really find it to be, by the gravity of most, if not of all bodies here below, and the confusibility of liquors and other fluids.
Boyle. Works, vol. v. p. 228.

Subsiding lungs their labouring vessels press,
Affected mutual with severe distress,
While towards the left their confluent torrents gush,
And on the heart's sinister cavern rush.
Brooke. Universal Beauty, b. iv.

Beyond this it was perfectly fresh, and formed of a fine running stream, along the side of which I walked till I came to the conflux of two small rivulets, that branched off to the right and left of a remarkably steep and romantick mountain.—Cook. Voyage, vol. vii. b. v. c. 1.

I haue such confidence in your Christen brest, as in my iudgment ye will conformably and gladly, both heare that may be reformed in you, and also (as it is worthy) so knowledge and confesse the same.
Foxe, Martyrs. A Let. of Latimer to Sir Ed. Boynton.

Wherefore the prelacy of the londe assymyled them in counceyll, and by a full & hoole auctoryte, seinge they might not enduce the kynge to noone conformytie or agremēt, to resume his lawfull wyfe, and to refuse that other, they denoūsed hym and his realme accursed.—Fabyan, c. 243.

We should never therefore use, behold or look upon any one of our fellow creatures, but we should be raised by them unto God, invited to devotion, and spurred to conform our wills and affections to the pattern of that eternal will, which they any way express.—Mede, Works, b. i. Dis. 35

Our purer essence then will overcome
Their noxious vapour, or enur'd not feel,
Or chang'd at length, and to the place conform'd
In temper and in nature, will receive
Familiar the fierce heat, and void of pain.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. ii.

May her gay mouth, which she no time may close,
So wide be, that the moon may turn therein.
May eyes and teeth be made conform to those;
Eyes set by chance and white, teeth black and thin.
Drummond. Tygris in Despraise of Beauty.

And we find that with these circumstances, their salts are always so figured, and always conformable to themselves. The figures whereof are very numerous, but all agree in being rectilinear, and composed of proportional sides and angles.—Grew. Cosmo. Sacra, b. i. c. 3.

Beloved, did we verily believe, that God could and would make us perfectly happy, if we serve him, though all the world conspire to make us miserable, and that he could and would make us miserable if we serve him not, though all the world should conspire to make us happy, how were it possible that to such a faith our lives should not be conformable.—Chillingworth, Ser. I.

Fresenbald, as he earnestly beheld this ragged striveling, who was not so disguised in his tattered attire, but that his countenance gave signification of much towardnes and vertue in him, with conformity of manners agreeing to the same, being moved with pity demanded of what country he was, and where he was borne.—Hakewill. Apologie, p. 456.

Because of this his raging, she could not hide,
By all her paintings any one deformitie
He saw most plainly that in her did bide,
Unto her former beauties no conformity.
Harrington. Orlando, b. xxii. s. 61.

You, it seemeth, are none of those we he speaketh of: for he meant it of the publick authorised doctrine of the Church of England, and of conformers unto the said doctrine of that Church.—Mountagu. An Appeale to Cæsar, c. 7.

I think those who make laws, and use force, to bring men to church-conformity in religion, seek only the compliance, but concern themselves not for the conviction of those they punish; and so never use force to convince. For, pray tell me, when any dissenter conforms, and enters into the Church-communion, is he ever examined to see whether he does it upon reason, and conviction, and such grounds as would become a Christian concerned for religion?
Locke. Second Letter concerning Toleration.

True holiness, we must know, is seated only in the soul, and is indeed nothing else but the right disposition of the several faculties of the soul, and their acting conformably to the law and nature of God.—Bp. Beveridge, vol. i. Ser. 39.

If the compact about matters of religion, be that those should be punished in their temporal, who neglect or despise their eternal interest, who, I beseech you, is by this agreement rather to be punished, a sober dissenter, who appears concerned for religion and his salvation, or an irreligious, prophane or debauched conformist?
Locke. Third Letter for Toleration.

In the Hebrew poetry, as I before remarked, there may be observed a certain conformation of the sentences, the nature of which is, that a complete sense is almost equally infused into every component part, and that every member constitutes an entire verse.—Lowth, pt. i. Lect. 3.

The case is the same, if the husband should be the conformist; though how the law is to operate in this case I do not see: for the act expressly says, that the child shall be taken from such Popish parent.—Burke. On the Popery Laws.

In conformity, indeed, to the unfeigned friendship which had so long been cemented between us, I rejoice in every advantage that can attend you, be it ever so inconsiderable, much more, therefore, in one so important to your happiness.—Melmoth. Cicero, b. xii. Let. 11.

That he for the perfighte loue whiche he bare to the noble feates of chyualrie and marciall actes, in auoidyng the slowe worme and deadly dormouse called idleness, the ruine of realmes and confounder of nobilitie, &c.—Hall. H. IV. an. 4.

I denie that any such perswasion is nourished in them, by suffering three or foure to communicate, but the contrarie rather, for the Godly example of these fewe may cyther prouoke the rest to the like diligence, or else confounde them and make them ashamed.—Whitgift. Defence, p. 533.

Whereat amaz'd, as one that unaware
Hath dropp'd a precious jewel in the flood,
Or 'stonish'd as night-wanderers often are,
Their light blown out in some mistrustful wood:
Even so confounded in the dark she lay.
Shakespeare. Venus & Adonis.

Massinger. The Fatal Dowry, Act iv. sc. 1.

For the new world her silver and her gold
Came, like a tempest, to confound the old.
Waller. On a War with Spain.

It was upon this very account that Christians took the pains to translate and publish them [Scriptures], not to confound religion but to confirm it.—Bentley. Free thinking

Our critic confounds the nature and order of things to make Paganism passive and unprovoked at a principle, which subverted the whole system of their religion, namely, the unsociability of the Christian faith, and yet mortally offended with a practice the most sacred and universal in Paganism, namely, mysterious and nocturnal rites.
Warburton. The Divine Legation, Preface.

With no reason on earth to go out of his way,
He [Garrick] turn'd and he varied full ten times a day.
Though secure of our hearts, yet confoundedly sick,
If they were not his own by finessing and trick.
Goldsmith. Retaliation.

CONFRA'CT. CONFRAGOSE. } Lat. Confractum, the past part. of Confringere; con, and frangere, to break. See FRACTION. Broken, cleft, craggy.

The body being into dust confract,
The spright dilute'd, spread by dispersion.
More. On the Soul, pt. iii. c. 3. s. 9.

But what was most stupendious to me was the rock of St Vincent, a little distance from ye towne, the precipice whereoff is equal to ye most confragose cataracts of the Alpes, the river gliding betweene them at an extraordinary depth.—Evelyn. Memoirs. June 27, 1654.

CONFRATE'RNITY. Lat. Con, and frater, a brother. (See Vossius, and Scheidius in Lemnius.) Frater may have passed from the Northern word, (the Goth. Brother,) by change first of h into p, and then of p into f. Verstegan uses Confrater. See CONFRIER.

A brotherhood, a society of brethren.

And all these live in one society, & confraternity, and by the name of brethren.—Stow. Of Universities, c. 10. p. 611.

And shall Patæcian, the notorious thiefe, be in better state after this life when he is once dispatched, only because he was entred and professed in the orders of this confraternity, than good Epaminondas!—Holland. Plutarch, p. 23.

The confraternities are in the Roman Church, what corporations are in a commonwealth, to wit, companies and societies, both of monks and other devout catholics, united together by free consent, and encouraged by great indulgences and spiritual privileges, toward the undertaking of some special piece of Roman devotion.

Brerwd. Saul & Samuel, p. 264.

To day I am just come from paying my adoration at St. Peter's to three extraordinary relics, which are exposed to public view only on these two days in the whole year, at which time all the confraternities in the city come in procession to see them.—Gray. To his Mother, Let. 19.

CONFRICA'TION. Lat. Confricare, atum; con, and fricare, to rub together. See FRICTION.

For sometyme the fyer toke by itself in the woodes by the mountaynes, through the vehemente confrication, frotynge and gatheringe by the trees, whyche happened by force of wynde, whereby arose a greater fyer & flame.

Nicoll. Thucydides, fol. 64.

It hath been reported, though it be scarce credible, that ivy hath grown out of a stag's-horne; which they suppose did rather come from a confrication of the horne upon the ivy, than from the horne itself.—Bacon. Nat. Hist. s. 550.

CONFRER. Fr. Confrères. See CONFRATERNITY.

Fellows of one and the same company or society, (Cotgrave.)

Gild-brother, a confrater, one that is a brother or confrere of the gild.—Verstegan. Rest. of Decayed Intelligence, c. 7.

CONFU'SE, v. CONFU'SED, adj. CONFU'SEDLY. CONFU'SEDNESS. CONFU'SELY. CONFU'SION. CONFU'SIVE. } Fr. Confus, confusion; It. Confuso, confusione; Sp. Confuso, confusion; Lat. Confusus, the past part. of confundere, to confound, (qv.) The verb, to confuse, does not imply a degree equal to the verb, to confound; but the difference is in usage only.

Confusion (met.) arises from astonishment; springing from a sense of inferiority, of error, of guilt: a perplexity, a disorder.

Whiche warne ioye was proposed to hym he suffride the cross and dispisede confusioun and sittith on the right half of the seete of God.—Wicliff. Hebrews, c. 12.

And in the erthe ouerlayinge of folkis, for confusioun of soun of the see and floodis.—Id. Luke, c. 21.

Alas! I ne have no language to tell
The effectes, ne the torment of min hell
Mine herte may mine harmes not bewrey;
I am so confuse, that I cannot say.

Chaucer. The Knightes Tale, v. 2232.

Gower. Conf. A. b. i.

And assone as he was come, he sente to defye the Frenche kyng, who was at Compyengne; whereof Loys, of Trauchen, who had alwayes before excused the duke, was so confused, that he wold no more returne agayne into Brabant, but dyed of sorowe in France.—Berners. Froiss. Cron. vol. i. c. 38.

Being willing to retire in that order, as the L. Baglione had prescribed vnto them, and could not, they cast themselves at the last into a confuse order, and retired, they being mingled amongst the Turks.

Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. ii. pt. i. p. 125.

And so when the most gracious Lord Jesus came forth, & saw a very great, but a confuse rabblement of all sortes of people (for there were men, women, and children) he was moued with compassion.—Udal. Mark, c. 6.

They vse both the Olde and Newe Testament, and reade both in their owne language, but so confusedly, that they themselues that doe reade, vnderstand not what themselues doe say.—Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p 253.

Ye shall not only endevour your selfe, and employ your most diligence, to enquire and fynde out such cankerd parsons, vicars, curats, which do not truely and substantially declare our said injunctions, and the very word of God, but mumble confusedly, saying that they be compelled to read them.—Burnet. Rec. No. 63. Original Letter of the King.

Thus haue I geuen you here the labours of a meany of Nérothes builders in the settynge vp this their great castel of confusyon.—Bale. Apologie, fol. 22.

The most confuse and licentious manor of beholding such spectacles, hee reformed and brought into order.

Holland. Suetonius, p. 59.

Beaum. & Fletch. The Elder Brother, Act iii. sc. 5.

As when a name lodg'd in the memory,
But yet through time almost obliterate,
Confusely hovers near the phantasie.

More. On the Soul, pt. ii. b. ii. c. 3. s. 11.

The retrait of the sunne had made a publicke and noted change, in the frame of nature; this particular alteration of the shadow in places limited, might satisfy no lesse, without a confusive mutation in the face of the world.

Bp. Hall. Cont. Hezekiah Sick, Recovered, Visited.

Amphion so made stones and timber leap
Into fair figures, from a confus'd heap:
And in the symmetry of her parts is found,
A power, like that of harmony in sound.

Waller. At Penshurst.

So that we have no kind of thing in the world, but our sins and follies that we can call our own; and those, God knows are so far from affording matter of boasting to us, that they ought to fill us with shame and confusion.

Sharp, vol. iv. Ser. 3.

But as he wrote at second hand and from hearsay only of things, which he himself had not seen, he is observed to have jumbled his facts together more confusedly, and described them more inaccurately, than the rest, who related them from their own knowledge.

Middleton. On the Variations in the Four Evangelists.

——— If we, unbroke,
Sustain their onset; little skill'd in war
To wheel, to rally and renew the charge,
Confusion, havock, and dismay will seize
The astonish'd rout.—Smollett. The Regicide, Act ii.

When lo! ere yet I gain'd its lofty brow,
The sound of dashing floods, and dashing arms,
And neighing steeds, confusive struck mine ear.

Warton, Ecl. 4.

CONFU'TE, v. CONFU'TER, n. CONFU'TEMENT. CONFU'TER. CONFU'TABLE. CONFU'TANT. CONFUTA'TION. CONFU'TATIVE. } Fr. Confuter; Sp. Confutar; It. Confutare; Lat. Confutare, (con, and ancient futare, which Festus explains, arguere.) But this acceptation, Vossius remarks, is metaphorical. He adds, est enim futare, a futo vase, quia ut futo fervens aqua, ita oratione compescantur adversarii. And Varro says, vas aquarium vocant futum, quo in triclinio allatum aquam infundebant.

Confutare, in its primary application, then, is to pour cold into hot water; to allay the fervour, to repress the ardour. And thus, (met.)—

To abate the force of argument; to resist, to repel it, to show its weakness, to prove its fallaciousness; to convict or convince of error, to disprove.

If his reasons bee light, and more good may be done in confuting him, than in confirming our owne; it were best of all to set vpon him, and put away by art, all that he hath fondly said without wit.—Wilson. Art of Rhetorike, p. 111.

I was of one poynt very fast & sure, that suche thynges as I write are consonant vnto the comon Catholike fayth and determinacions of Christe's Catholike Churche, and are clear confutacions of false blasphemous heresies by Tyndall and Barnes putte forthe vnto the countrey.

Sir T. More. Workes, p. 845.

Some men may be confuted in their errors, and persuaded out of them, but no man's error can be confuted, who together with his error doth not believe and grant some true principle that contradicts his error; for nothing can be proved to him who grants nothing, neither can there be (as all men know) any rational discourse, but out of grounds agreed upon by both parts.

Chillingworth. Rel. of Protestant Church, pt. i. c. 4.

It [is] generally known, how and by whom ye have been instigated to a hard censure of that former book entitled The Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce, an opinion held by some of the best among reformed writers without scandal or confutement, tho' now thought new and dangerous by some of our severe gnostics.

Milton. Tetrachordon. To the Parliament.

For error is no good confuter of error, as it is no good conversion that reforms one vice with another.

Bp. Taylor. On Repentance, c. 6. s. 5.

Now against the rancour of an evil tongue, from which I never thought so absurdly, as that I of all men should be exempt, I must be forc'd to proceed from the unfeigned and diligent inquiry of mine own conscience at home (for better way I know not Readers) to give a more true account of myself abroad than this modest confuter as he calls himself, hath given of me.—Milton. Apology for Smectymnuus.

Now that the confutant may also know as he desires, what force of teaching there is sometimes in laughter; I shall return him in short, that laughter being one way of answering a fool according to his folly, teaches two sorts of persons.—Id. Ib.

When a gentleman was commending Dr. Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, his great paines in the confutation of Luther's books, the wise prelate said heartily, that he wish'd he had spent all that time in prayer and meditation which he threw away upon such useless wranglings.

Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, Pref

For when disputes are weary'd out,
'Tis interest still resolves the doubt:
But since no reason can confute ye,
Ill try to force you to your duty.—Hudibras, pt. ii. c. 2.

The third affirmeth that the roots of mandrakes do make a noise, or give a shreek upon eradication, which is indeed ridiculous and false below confute.—Brown. Vul. Err. b. ii. c. 6.

Which conceit being already convicted, not only by Scaliger, Bjolanus, and others; but daily confutable almost every where out of England; we shall not further refute.

Id. Ib. b. iii. c. 8.

A conceit not only injurious unto truth, and confutable by daily experience, but somewhat derogatory unto the Providence of God.—Id. Ib. b. ii. c. 6.

Our author knows he has all the common people on his side, and they only read the Gazettes of their own writers; so that every thing which is called an answer, is with them a confutation.—Dryden. The D. of York's Papers Defended.

He [our Saviour] foresaw that the great and popular objections to him would be that he was a magician: and therefore he confuted it before hand, and ejected evil spirits, to show that he was in no confederacy with them.

Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History.

He reckons Damasus and Ambrose amongst the most strenuous defenders of the faith, and confuters of heretics.

Id. Ib.

In the mean time, while affliction presseth hard upon us, while our deliverance is deferred, and the enemy is suffered to reproach and blaspheme; our prayer must be, that God would give us courage and utterance, still to confess him before men, and boldly to speak "his word of truth" for the edification of some and the confutation of others.

Bp. Horne. On the Psalms, Ps. 119.

Albinus, in his fifth section, divides Plato's Dialogues into classes. Not into two general ones of exoteric and esoteric; but into the more minute, and different, of natural, moral, dialectic, confutative, civil, explorative, obstetrick, and subversive.—Warburton. P. S. to Remarks on Tillard.

CONGE, v. } Fr. Congé; It. Congedo; Mid. CONGE, n. } Lat. Commeatus. The etymology, Menage, Skinner, and Du Cange, agree to be from the Lat. Commeatus. The Italian Menage traces thus:—Commeatus, It. Commiato, comiato, comjato, congedo. The French, thus:—Commeatus, commiatus, comjatus, congé. In as far, says Skinner, as Commeatus signifies the liberty of going here and there, Congy is applied by us to the respectful bending of the body towards our friend, as if beseeching leave or liberty to depart. In correspondence with this, is the English expression, To take leave.

"Fr. Congédier,—to dismiss, discharge licence, give leave unto, permit to go, suffer to depart," (Cotgrave.)

He who told one who then was Fortune's childe,
As if with horrour to congeale his bloud:
That Caius Marius farre from Rome exil'd,
Wretch'd on the ruines of great Carthage stood,
Though long both plagu'd by greefe, and by disgrace,
The consul-ship regaind, and dy'd in peace.
Stirling. Chorasses in Julius Cæsar, ch. 5.

And therefore waters frozen in pans, and open glasses, after their dissolution do commonly leave a froth and spume upon them; which are caused by the airy parts diffused in the congealable mixture.—Brown. Vul. Err. b. ii. c. 1.

But I am not so uncharitable to think that all our thoughts of kindness to death are the congelation of such black melancholick vapours; 'tis, I hope, in some an obedience to Plato's precept, the προμελετᾶν ευχημοσυνην, the endeavouring to behave one's self comely in whatever fortune.
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 492.

Enter the citty, clip your wiues, your friends,
Tell them your feats, whilst they with ioyfull teares
Wash the congealement from your wounds, and kisse

Shakespeare. Antony & Cleopatra, Act iv. sc. 8.

It [the island of Sal] hath its name from the abundance of salt that is naturally congealed there, the whole island being full of large salt ponds.—Dampier. Voyage, an. 1683.

And yet this hot and subtile liquor I have found upon trial, purposely made, to be more easily congealable (in the sense freshly explained) by cold than even common water.
Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 493.

Not here to repeat what we formerly delivered of the easy congealableness of oil of aniseeds, we have (as we elsewhere note to another purpose) distilled a substance from benzoin, which becomes a fluid, a consistent body.—Id. Ib. vol. ii. p. 497.

Near them little plates of sugar plumbs, disposed like so many heaps of hail stones, with a multitude of congelations in jellies of various colours.—Tatler, No. 148.

When Priam strains his aged arm, to throw
His unavailing jav'lin at the foe;
(His blood congeal'd and every nerve unstrung)
Then with the theme complies the artful song;
Like him the solitary numbers flow,
Weak, trembling, melancholy, stiff and slow.
Pitt. Vida's Art of Poetry.

GONGE'NERATE, v. } Lat. Congenerare, CONGE'NERACY. GONGE'NEROUS. CONGE'NEROUSNESS. } atum; con, and generare, formed from Gr. Γεν-αω, to beget, or bear. See CONGENITE, infra.

That they are ranged neither according to merit, nor congeneracy, of their conditions.—More. Expos. Seven Ch. p. 172.

And therefore as this number ten (according as I noted before) was called κοσμος, for the comprehensiveness of the title; so, I conceive, congenerous to this are those names of [illegible], &c. these all of them being of a comprehensive signification.—More. App. to Def. of Phil. Cabbala, p. 119.

Rational means, and persuasive arguments, whose force and strength must lie in their congenerousness and suitableness with the ancient ideas and inscriptions of truth upon our souls.—Hollywell. Saviour of Souls.

Then these things being carried respectively, sight to the eyes, and whiteness to the object, which did actively beget it, the eye becomes full of sight, and sees, and is not made sight in the abstract, but an eye seeing; and that which did congenerate the colour, is fitted with whiteness, and is made, not whiteness in the abstract, but a thing white, whether wood or stone.—Cudworth. Morality, b. i. c. 3.

In this place we should introduce the wolf, a congenerous animal, if we had not fortunately a just right to omit it in a history of British quadrupeds.
Pennant. British Zoology. The Wolf.

CONGE'NITE, adj. } Lat. Con, and genitus, past part. of Geno; CONGE'NIAL. CONGENIA'LITY. CONGE'NIOUS. } Gr. Γεν-αω, ειν, to beget, to bear.

Begotten or born together; produced in union with something else; connate.

Congenial,—of or pertaining to the same kind, suited or adapted to the kind, nature or disposition.

From an inclination it came to a firm persuasion and so to a law. God, in this, ruling in our hearts something after the manner by which he reigns in Heaven, even by significations of what is fit, by inspirations and congenite notices, by natural necessities.—Bp. Taylor. Rule of Cons. b. ii. c. 1.

But, as two voyces in one song embrace,
Fletcher's keen tribble, and deep Beaumont's base,
Two, full, congenial souls; still both prevail'd;
His muse and thine were quarter'd, not impal'd.
Berkenhead. On the Collection of Fletcher's Works.

Even the pride that I take in a certain congeniality (as I may term it) with your lordship's studies, will scant let me cease.—Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 299.

In the blood thus dropp'd there remains a spirit of life congenious to that in the body.—Hale's Remains, p. 288.

Superstructing almost their whole physics upon abstracted reason; by which I mean the rational faculty, endowed but with its own congenit, or common notions and ideas.
Boyle. Works, vol. v. p. 513.

Some here restrain that maxim ("whatsoever is sinful, is also voluntary,") only to sinful actions; but it may be as true of sinful habits, which, though congenit with our natures, may be yet said to be free and voluntary.
South, vol. viii. Ser. 13.

For models, made to mend our kind,
To no one clime should be confin'd:
And manly virtue, like the sun,
His course of glorious toils should run;
Alike diffusing in his sight
Congenial joy, and life, and light.
Swift. The Birth of Manly Virtue.

That approbation which the world has uniformly given, I have endeavoured to justify by such proofs as questions of this kind will admit; by the analogy, which painting holds with the sister arts, and consequently by the common congeniality, which they all bear to our nature.
Sir J. Reynolds, Dis. 15.

CONGERIES. Lat. Congerere, to heap together; con, and gerere, which Vossius interprets manum administrare, formed from Χερ-ος, oblique case, from Χειρ, the hand. Pliny mentions a crow, which in time of drought was seen—lapides congerentem in situlam monimenti, "casting stones into the bucket of a sepulcre," till by heaping up (tali congerie) many stones, he brought the water to rise so high, that he could drink with ease.

A number of separate particles, or distinct bodies heaped, piled or collected together into one mass; a collection.

A cherry, I say, is nothing but a congeries of sensible impressions, or ideas perceived by various senses: which ideas are united into one thing (or have one name given them) by the mind; because they are observed to attend each other.
Berkeley, Dial. 3.

Their most remote account reaches to Tatuma and Tapuppa, male and female stones or rocks, who support the congeries of land and water, of our globe underneath.
Cook. Voyage, vol. vi. b. iii. c. 9.

CONGE'ST, v. } Lat. Congerere, congestum, CONGE'STION. } to heap together. See above CONGERIES.

To heap or pile up together; to collect or gather into one mass, to amass. See an additional example in v. CONJECT.

I strong o'er them, and you o'er me being strong,
Must for your victory us all congest,
As compound love to physic your cold breast.
Shakespeare. A Lover's Complaint.

——In whose minde
Worlds of heroick vertues are congested
To make him up a worthy.
Nabbes. Hannibal & Scipio, D 2.

So is the opinion of some divines, that, until after the Flood, were no mountains, but that by congestion of sand, earth, and such stuff as we now see hills strangely fraughted with, in the waters they were first cast up.
Drayton. Poly-Olbion. Illustrations on, s. 9.

I observed that the church yards (at Norwich) were filled up with earth, or rather the congestion of dead bodys, one upon another for want of earth.
Evelyn. Memoirs, 17 Oct. 1671.

But 'midst thy boundless joys, unbridled youth,
Remember still this sad, but certain truth,
That thou at last severely must account;
To what will thy congested guilt amount?
Blackmore. Creation, b. vii.

CONGIARY. Lat. Congiarium, from Congius, the name of a measure; perhaps from Concha, a shell. See the quotations.

How be it, himselfe when he returned out of Asia, in a congiarie or largesse, that hee gave unto the people, made a dole and distribution of more than an hundred thousand measures of gallons apiece.—Holland, b. xiv. c. 14.

To this man last rehersed the peoples favour and affection most inclined, by reason of many congiaries and largesses, which he had given amongst them in publick, by meanes whereof many a man was obliged and bound unto him.
Id. Livius, p. 980.

He gave congiaries often times to the people, but lightly they were of diuerse summes, one while 100, another while 300, and some times 200 and fiftie sesterces, and he left not so much as boyes under age, whereas they had not wont to receive such congiaries, unlesse they were above eleuen yeares olde.—Id. Suetonius. Augustus, p. 57.

CONGLA'CIATE. } Lat. Conglaciare, atum, CONGLACIA'TION. } (con, and glaciare.) in glacies convertere, to convert into ice, (Gesner.) A gelando est glacies, quasi gelacies, (Vossius.) And Gel-are, perhaps from Gr. Γελ-αω, splendere, to shine.

To bind or fix a fluid or liquid into a solid by cold, by frost, as water into ice; to congeal; to freeze.

For water commonly concreteth first in its surface, and so congluciates downwards.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. ii. c. 1.

Predictions may be made of future comets, which as we conjecture may be foretold; and of all sorts of meteors, of deluges, draughts, heates; conglaciations, &c.
Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats.

CONGLO'BE, v. CONGLO'BATE, v. CONGLO'BATE, adj. CONGLOBA'TION. CONGLO'BULATE. Lat. Conglobare; con, and globus, a ball. See GLOBE, and CONGLOMERATE, infra. To gather, collect, or coalesce into a globe, or ball, or sphere.

So high as heav'n the tumid hills, so low
Down sunk a hollow bottom broad and deep,
Capacious bed of waters; thither they
Hasted with glad precipitance, uprowl'd
As drops on dust conglobing from the drie.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. vii.

This may after conglobate into the form of an egg.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iii. c. 7.

In this spawn of a lentous and transparent body, are to be discerned many specks, or little conglobations, which in a small time become of deep black.—Id. Ib. b. iii. c. 14.

'Tis clear, that it is not done by meer conglobation.
Digby. On the Soul, c. 2.

——— Along their face
The big round drops course down with silent pace,
Conglobing on the gust.—Pope. Homer, Iliad, b. xvii.

None want a place, for all their centre found.
Hung to the goddess and coher'd around.
Not closer, orb in orb, conglob'd are seen
The buzzing bees about their dusky queen.
Id. Dunciad, b. iv.

Heaven's gifts, which do like falling stars appear
Scatter'd in ether; all, as in their sphere,
Were fix'd, conglobate in his soul; and thence
Shone through his body, with sweet influence.
Dryden. Upon the Death of Lord Hastings.

——— When the trumpet's call,
As sounding brass, collects us round heaven's throne
Conglob'd, we bask in everlasting day,
(Paternal splendour!) and adhere for ever.
Young. Complaint, Night 7.

Matter being supposed eternal, there never was a time, when it could be diffused before its conglobation, or conglobated before its diffusion.
Johnson. Review of Four Letters from Sir I. Newton.

Swallows certainly sleep all the winter. A number of them conglobulate together, by flying round and round, and then all in a heap throw themselves under water, and lie in the bed of a river.—Id. Boswell's Life of Johnson.

CONGLOMERATE, v. CONGLO'MERATE, adj. CONGLOMERA'TION. Lat. Conglomerare, atum, to wind up into bottoms, i. e. balls, (Minshew.) Con, and glomerare. To wind or roll up into balls; to collect or gather up into masses—by weaving or spinning; and thus, to interweave.

The beams of light, when they are multiplied and conglomerate, generate heat.—Bacon. Natural History.

This suggests to the spider the fancy of spinning and weaving her web, and to the bee of the framing of her honey combs, but especially to the silk-worm of conglomerating her both funeral and natal clue.
More. Immortality of the Soul, b. iii. c. 13.

And yet there is a great affinity betwixt the nidifications of birds, and these conglomerations of the threads of the silk worm.—Id. Ib.

Proceeding very warily in the breaking one of these stones, we found that in the centre of it there lay a soft and oval stone, as it were the kernel of those conglomerated shells.—Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 81.

Eternal damps, and deadly humours drawn
In poisonous exhalations from the deep,
Conglomerated into sooty night,
And darkness, almost to be felt, forbid
The sun, with cheerful beams, to purge the air.
Thomson. Sickness, b. ii.

CONGLUTINATE, v. CONGLU'TINATE, adj. CONGLUTINA'TION. Fr. Conglutiner; Sp. Conglutinar, It. Conglutinare; Lat. Conglutinare, (con, and glutinare,) to glue together. To glue together; to stick fast; to adhere, (sc.) as if by some viscous or glutinous substance.

Also by reason of the affinitie, whiche it hath with mylke, it is convertible into bloud and fleshe, specially in those persons, whiche do inhabyte the northe partes, in whom natural heat is conglutinate.
Sir T. Elyot. Castel of Helth, b. ii.

But for as muche as the whole bodye is perfectly conglutinate in itself, it commeth to passe, that the spirite of Christe practiseth his efficacie in euerye member accordyng to their seueral capacitie and ordre.—Udal. Ephesians, c. 4.

All these together conglutinate and effectually executed, maketh a perfect definition of iustice.
Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. iii. c. 1.

It is said moreover, that the white of an egg is very good to conglutinate or sowder any wound.
Holland. Pinie, b. xxix. c. 3.

For generative seed is the superfluous excrement of that nourishment which is conglutinate to the substantial parts of the body.—Id. Plutarch, p. 850.

His is no mixion nor conglutination, but a certaine troublesome striving and combate.—Id. Ib. p. 911.

Mathulus relates that in many the bones having been very well set (which circumstance, he requires as necessary) have had their broken parts conglutinated within three or four days.—Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 136.

When the callus is making, and the broken parts of the bone begin to be conglutinated together, a portion of that blood, which had flowed to the part affected, is carried to the skin, and permeates that.—Id. Ib. vol. iv. p. 772.

CONGRATULATE, v. CONGRATULA'TION. CONGRA'TULATOR. CONGRATULA'TORY. CONGRA'TULANT, adj. Fr. Congratuler; Sp. Congratular; It. Congratulare; Lat. Congratulari; qui gratulatur, alienam felicitatem sibi gratam et jucundam esse verbis ostendit. See GRATEFUL.

To express our sympathy in the good fortune or happiness of another; that such good fortune is grateful, agreeable, pleasing to us; that we rejoice in his joy; share or partake in it.

The inhabitants of Burdeaux hearing of the erle's arrival, sent to him messengers in the darke night thâking and congratulating for his thither commyng.—Hall. Hen. VI. an. 36.

I answered, that your maiestie had sent messengers to Ken Can, and that you would not haue sent messengers vnto him, or letters vnto Sartach, had not your highness bene perswaded that they were become Christians because you sent not vnto them for any feare, but onely for congratulation, and curtesie's sake, in regard that you heard that they were conuerted to Christianitie.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 109.

The custome was, one primacye to haue to doe with an other by congratulatorye letters soone after the certaintee of their election was knowne, to keepe the unitie of the church.
Fox. Martyrs. Tonstall and Stokesley to Pole.

He that in glory of his fortune sat,
Admiring what he thought could never be,
Did feel his blood within salute his state,
And lift up his rejoicing soul, to see
So many hands and hearts congratulate
Th' advancement of his long-desir'd degree.
Daniel. Civil Wars, b. ii.

Nor was this shew of love dissimulation,
But true unfained kindnesse, and good faith,
But yet Gradasso's faint congratulation
Makes men surmise he thinks not as he saith.
Harrington. Orlando, b. xxx. s. 68.

And certainly, as an accumulation of paternal honour in deeming us worthy to succeed him, nothing more noble, more illustrious, could befall us than the judgment of such a prince, nothing more fortunately auspicious could happen to us at our first entrance upon the government, than such a congratulator.—Milton. Letters. Cromwell to Gustavus.

The lords desired the concurrence of the commons to a congratulatory declaration from the houses to the army, and to a letter to the general.—Whitelock. Mem. an. 1647.

Forth rush'd in haste the great consulting peers,
Rais'd from their dark divan, and with like joy
Congratulant approach'd him, who with hand
Silence, and with these words attention won.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. x.

Men met each other with erected look
The steps were higher that they took,
Friends to congratulate their friends made haste;
And long inveterate foes saluted as they past.
Dryden. Threnodia Augustalis.

My congratulations keep their distance, and pass no farther than my heart. There it is that I have all the joy imaginable when I see true worth rewarded, and virtue uppermost in the world.—Id. Dedication of Troil. & Cress.

He [Edward VI.] both wooed for his uncle, recommending him unto the queen [Katherine Par] and after the marriage wrote her a congratulatory letter.
Strype. Memorials. Edw. VI. an. 1548.

You congratulate me on the prosperous situation of my affairs in general, and particularly on the friendship of Milo, together with the vain and ineffectual schemes of the worthless Clodius.—Melmoth., Cicero, b. ii. Let. 2.

Still Cali lives; and must he live to morrow?
That fawning villain's forc'd congratulations
Will cloud my triumphs and pollute the day.
Johnson. Irene, Act iv. sc. 6.

CONGRE'E, v. To agree together. See AGREE.

For government, though high, and low, and lower,
Put into parts, doth keepe in one consent,
Congreeing in a full and and naturall close,
Like musicke. Shakespeare. Hen. V. Act i. sc. 2.

CONGRE'ET, v. A. S. Gret-an; Dut. Groet-en; Ger. Gruss-en. "Gret-an, gretan sendan, salutare, salutem dicere; to salute, to greet, to send greeting," (Somner.)

Since then my office hath so farre preuayl'd,
That face to face, and royal eye to eye,
You haue congreeted.—Shakespeare. Hen. V. Act v. sc. 2.

CO'NGREGATE, v. CONGRE'GATE, adj. CONGREGA'TION. CONGREGA'TIONAL. CONGREGA'TIONALISTS. Fr. Congréger; Sp. Congregar; It. Congregare; Lat. Congregare, (con, and grex, a flock;) from Αγειρ-ειν, and that from Αγ-ειν, cogere in unum: to drive into one, (sc.) flock, herd, &c.

To flock together, to herd together; to come, or cause to come, together in a flock or herd; to collect, gather, or assemble.

In the mean season caused they their hyred seruantes to blowe it forth abroade throughoute all the hole realme, that they were there congregated for an wholesome unite and reformacion of the church of Ingland, to stoppe so the mouthes of the comen people.
State Trials. Sir John Oldcastle, an. 1413.

The Duke of Somerset and other, whiche narrowly escaped, fled with the Queene and Prince Edward, into the bishoprucke of Durhame, in which place they determined to congregate and gather a new armye and power, and if no hope were of recouery, they then agreed to fly into Scotland.
Hall. Hen. VI. an. 38.

Thē ye kyng beyng warned of ye congregacions yt this Wyllyam made, commanded hem to cease of such doyngys, yt the people myght exercyse theyr artis & occupacios.
Fabyan, vol. ii. an. 1198.

Into their secretes come not my soule, and into their congregacion be my honour not coupled.
Bible, 1551. Exod. c. 49.

In this parliament it was first concluded; that deposed King Richard should continue in a large prison, and be plenteously served of all things necessary both for viand and apparell, and if any persons should presume to reare warre or congregate a multitude to deliver him out of prison, that then he should be the first that should die for that seditious commotion.—Prynne. Soveraigne Power of Parl. pt. i. p. 95.

The heauens herald staid not to reply,
But past away, his doings to relate
Vnto his Lord; who now in th' highest sky,
Was placed in his principall estate,
With all the Gods about him congregate.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. vii. c. 6.

But from this congregation hee sequestered and removed the base multitude of mechanicall labourers and slaves.
Holland. Suetonius, p. 165.

Then, with a breath, he gave the winds to blow;
And bade the congregated waters flow.
Dryden. Ovid. Metamorphoses, b. i.

But suppose the first churches were barely congregational, by reason of the small number of believers at that time, yet what obligation lies upon us to disturb the peace of the church we live in, to reduce churches to their infant state?
Stillingfleet, vol. ii. Ser. 6.

Whether to genial dews above
You melt the congregated skies,
Or teach the torrent streams below
To wake the verdure of the vale.
Whitehead. The New Year, Ode 2.

With farther preparation, and a little more experience, he preached in a more public pulpit, before one of the largest and most polite congregations at London.
Dr. Horne. Life by Jones.

But may he not think too ill of their spirit? I verily believe he doeth; or if he doeth not, is there not an equal share of the same spirit in too many of the presbyterians and congregationalists there.
Abp. Secker. Answer to Dr. Mayhew's Observations.

CONGRESS. CONGRE'SSION. CONGRE'SSIVE. Lat. Congredi, congressus, to go, meet or assemble together; con, and grad-i. See GRADE.

A meeting or coming together, an assembly, a concourse, a communication.

It follows not that all such approaches were unlawful: as appears in the case of a leprous wife, with whom that it is lawful to have congress is so certain, that it is told as an heroick story of Dominicus Catalucius, a Prince of Lesbos, that he did usually converse with his wife that was a leper, as still knowing it to be his own flesh, which no man hates.
Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. ii. c. 2.

All which I have meant hitherto in reference to their visible congresses one with another.
More. Immortality of the Soul, b. iii. c. 7.

And if the danger be an excuse and can legitimate the congression even where there is hazard to have a diseased child begotten, in one case, then so it is in the other.
Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. ii. c. 2.

For if that be male which generates in another, that female which procreates in itself, if it be understood of sexes conjoyned, all plants are female; and if of disjoyned and congressive generation, there is no male or female in them at all.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. ii. c. 6.

Hereupon the congress grew wholly desperate, and all parties prepared for the field without any other view for the three months following the first rise of this pretension.
Sir W. Temple. Memoirs, 1672 to 79.

——— Alas! the thoughts
Of that sweet congress, the preceding night,
Soften'd my dreams, and all my senses lull'd;
And with more joyful heart at morn I rose.
Warton, Eclogue 3.

CONGRU'E, v. / CONGRU'E, adj. / CO'NGRUENT. / CO'NGRUENCE. / CO'NGRUENCY. / CO'NGRUENTLY. / CONGRU'ITY. / CO'NGRUELY. / CO'NGRUOUS. / CO'NGRUOUSLY. } Lat. Congruere, a gruibus, (cranes) which never separate, either when flying or feeding, (Festus.) The Lat. Grus, contracted from Gr. Γερ-ανος, of unknown etymology.

To flock or come together; to convene or concur; to be convenient, or consistent, suitable or agreeable, fit or proper.

The scholastic distinction between merit of congruity and merit of condignity, seems well explained by Hobbs, thus:—

But there is between these two sorts of merit, this difference, that in contract I merit by virtue of my own power, and the contractor's need; but in this case of free gift, I am enabled to merit only by the benignity of the giver. In contract, I merit at the contractor's hand that he should depart with his right; in case of gift, I merit not that the giver should part with his right, but that when he has parted with it, it should be mine, rather than another's. And this I think to be the meaning of that distinction of the schools, between meritum congrui, and meritum condigni. For God Almighty, having promised Paradise to those men (hoodwinked with carnal desires) that can walk through this world according to the precepts and limits prescribed by him; they say, he that shall so walk, shall merit Paradise ex congruo. But because no man can demand a right to it by his own righteousness, or any other power in himself, but by the free grace of God only; they say, no man can merit Paradise ex condigno.—Hobbs. Of Man, pt. i. c. 14.

Grammar, first hath for to teche
To speake vpon congruites.—Gower. Con. A. b. vii.

I professe and denounce in like manner, that neither haue you any iust congrue occasion in my book so to iudge, muche lesse to raile of me.—Fox. Martyrs. Alanus Copus the Sycophant, answered, p. 645.

I cal not them gramariens, whiche onely can teache or make rules, wherby a childe shal onelye lerne to speake congrue Latine, or to make axe versis standynge in one fote, wherin perchance shall be neyther sentence nor eloquence.
Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. i. c. 15.

It is therefore congruent, and accordynge, that as one excelleth another, in that influence, as thereby beinge nexte to the similitude of his Maker, so shulde the estate of his person be anaunced in degree, or place, where vnderstandynge maye profyt.—Id. Ib. b. i. c. 1.

Infidels may haue this attrition (for you graunt, that it cõmeth of naturall strength) and yet shall it not folowe of congruence, that they must receiue grace, and also remissiõ of their sinnes.—Barnes. Workes, p. 273.

But in conclusion the Frenshe kynge so entreated theym, that they agreed to rest there styll, and that of a congruency, for they might dwell in no lãde where they shulde more surely be defended.—Fabyan, vol. ii. an. 1273.

But this we maie see, what it is to haue a prince learned himselfe, who feeling and tasting the price and value of science and knowledge, is thereby not onelie the more apt to rule, but also to instruct and frame his subjects, from a rude barbaritie, to a more ciuil congruencie of life, and to a better understanding of things.
Fox. Martyrs. King Alfred religious & learned p. 130.

And as for the bishoprike of Durham, to say the very truth, he could not of good congruity but reward his old chapmane.—Tyndall. Workes, p. 374.

And seuing for yᵗ point which is no smal mater, elles as for his rules of rhetorike or grãmaticall congruitie either, or ouersight in reasoning, as thinges of no great weight, I would not much vouchsafe to touche.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 875.

I might conclude that his [Henry VII.] actes passed all the noble acts of his noble progenitours syne the Conquest, and may most congruly alsone erthly prynces be lykenyd vnto Salamon Kynge of the Israelytes, and be called the seconde Salamon.—Fabyan, an. 1485.

Our saied lorde the Kyng to hym whom that suche maner of houses, edefices or places of ground longeth or appertaineth shal satisfie & of other houses & edefices or places congruely shall recompence.—Hall. Hen. V. an. 6.

——— Right convenently
And full congruently
As nature could diuise.—Skelton. Bake of Philip Sparow.

Of good congruence all subjects become most bound to their soveraigne and princes, and them ought most faithfully to love, honour, obey, serve and dread.
Strype. Memorials. Hen. VIII. Discourse, an. 1533.

The congruent and harmonious fitting of parts in a sentence hath almost the fastening and force of knitting and connection; as in stones well squared, which will rise strong a great way without mortar.—B. Jonson. Discoveries.

By her meanes winding himself into the favour of Nero, he easily obtained the chief place among his minions and favourites (such was the congruence of their humours and dispositions.)—Holland. Suetonius, p. 223.

The congruity of things is their suitablenesse to such or such a state or condition, and 'tis a great law in the Divine and first constitutions, that things should incline and move to what is suitable to their natures.
Glanvill. Pre-existence of Souls, c. 13.

This of hope is a middle temper, and so a little more congruous and apportion'd to the middle state, more ingenuous than fear, and not so elevated as love.
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 505.

We cannot but conclude from such a train of causes so fitly and congruously complying together, That it was really the counsel of an Universal and Eternal Mind, that hath the overseeing and guidance of the whole frame of nature.
More. Antidote against Atheism, c. 4.

Thus by man's referring the knowledge of the creature to the Creator's glory, it becomes in some sense, and congruously to its own nature, the praiser of its Maker.
Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 33.

Though these [the discourses and instructions of Mentor] were well suited to the main design of the author, which was to form the mind of a young prince, yet they seem not congruous to the nature of epic poetry.—Blair, Lect. 44.

The point lies here, to wit, whether it be so congruous to God to reward the obedience, and good actions of men, that it is incongruous to his nature not to do it. And this I utterly deny.—South, vol. iii. Ser. 1.

CONJE'CT, v. / CONJE'CTOR. / CONJE'CTURE, v. / CONJE'CTURE, n. / CONJE'CTURER. / CONJE'CTURAL. / CONJE'CTURALLY. / CONJECTURA'LITY. } Lat. Conjicere, conjectum, to throw together, (con, and jacere, to throw;) Fr. Conjecturer; Sp. Conjeturar; It. Conghietturare, congetturare. Conjicere proprie est res plures in unum jacere locum. Hinc ad mentem transfertur. (To throw or cast many things together: hence, transferred to the mind.) Nec tamen tam signat multa in mente conjungere, quam, ubi junxeris, unum pluribus consideratis colligere. (Vossius.)

To throw together, (met.) the thoughts; to throw, cast, or take out; to pick out or select from thoughts so thrown together; to guess, to divine. See the quotations from the Governour and Hobbs.

In Shakespeare, (Othello, Act iii. sc. 3,) the Commentators have altered conceits, in the first folio, to conjects.

Him that one hateth, hate we all
And conject how to doen him fall.—Chaucer. Rom. of the R.

——— They but dorst han swore
That to Jamele, of which I spake before,
She doughter n'as, for as by conjecture
Hem thoughte she was another creature.
Id. The Clerkes Tale, v. 8759

That whych is presently doon we perceyue, that whyche is to come, we conject or dyuyne.
Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. iii. c. 22.

Moreouer after the thinges be inuẽted, conjected, perceyued, and by long tyme and often consydered, and that the mynd dysposeth herselfe to executiõ or actual operation: thanne the vertue, named prudence, first putteth her selfe forwardes.
Id. Ib. b. iii. c. 23.

When thou hast tolde thy tale
which is but short and sweet
Then let my lone conject the reast
till she and I do meete.
Turbervile. To his Ring given to his Ladie, &c.

Neither shall oure delyuerance come so to pass, nor by sicke meanes as we conjecter.—Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, c. 10.

You shal perceiue the treasons false of Greeks, and of this one
Conjecture all. Phaer. Virgill. Eneidos, b. ii.

But without doubt (by all conjectures of reason) the said islands fall all without the limitation of Portingal, and pertaine to Spayne.—Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 215.

The oration conjecturall is when matters bee examined, and tried out by suspitions gathered, and some likelihood of thing appearing.—Wilson. The Arte of Rhetorike, p. 92.

So shall the weight of these conjectural gheasses, and the face of M. Hardinge's truthe, whiche he so muche magnifieth without cause, the better appeare.
Jewell. Defence of the Apologie, p. 263.

Nor [do] these men cast on mee particular calumnies but per satyram congested and conjected at a mass upon the Church of England in pretence of mee.
Mountagu. An Appeale to Cæsar, p. 298.

Because he pretends to be a great conjector at other men by their writings, I will not fail to give ye readers, a present taste of him from his title, hung out like a toling signpost to call passengers.—Milton. An Apology for Smectymnuus.

I will set downe the Lord's prayer as it was translated in sondrie ages, that you may see by what degrees our tongue is risen, and thereby conjecture how in time it may alter and fall againe.—Camden. Remains. Languages.

If a man seeth in present, that which he hath seen before, he thinks that that which was antecedent to that which he saw before, is also antecedent to that he presently seeth: As for example, he that hath seen the ashes remain after the fire, and now again seeth ashes, concludeth again there hath been fire: and this is called again conjecture of the past, or presumption of the fact.—Hobbs. Hum. Nat. c. 5.

By his natural prudence, without the help of instruction before or after, he [Themistocles] was both of extemporary matters upon short deliberation, the best discerner, and also of what for the most part would be their issue the best conjecturer.—Id. Tuscanes, b. i. p. 74.

But for old English names which here are the scope of my care, I must set them as I may out of old English Saxon treatises, as I have happened upon here and there, and some conjecturally, referring all to the judgment of such, as shall be more happy in finding out the truth.
Camden. Remains. Names.

Who [Aristotle] in matters of difficulty, and such which were not without abstrusities conceived it sufficient to deliver conjecturalities.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. vii. c. 14.

What those things were which some among the Corinthians built upon the foundation of Christianity, whereby they endanger'd their salvation, we may probably conjecture by what the apostle reproves in his epistle, as the tolerating of incestuous marriages, communicating in idol feasts, &c.
Tillotson, vol. i. Ser. 9.

If this be a good objection, it will at all times equally hinder us from abounding in the offices of charity since there is no time, when we may not entertain such conjectures as these, and alarm ourselves with such fears and forebodings.—Atterbury, vol. ii. Ser. 7.

But because these conjecturers do not allow glass to be pervious to common air, we shall at present press them with this experiment, which we have divers times made.
Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 543.

I would beseech my readers not to look upon any thing as my opinion or assertion, that is not delivered in the future series of my own words; lest a transcriber should make me deliver those things resolutely and dogmatically, which I deliver but hesitantly and conjecturally.—Id. Ib. vol. i. p. 314.

When men had nothing to trust to, in their predictions, but their own ingenuity, they did well to deal in equivocal or enigmatic expression, and might leave it to chance, or to the passions of their votaries, to find an application for their random conjectures.—Hurd. Works, vol. v. Ser. 1.

Certainly such a religion (though accompanied with some degree of superstition, together with a belief of the heathen and the turpe, and with a tolerable system of morals, and with some conjectural hopes of a life after this, is far preferable to atheism.—Jortin. On Eccles. Hist.

CONIFEROUS. Bearing fruit in shape of a cone, (qv.)

In transplanting of these resinacious and coniferous trees you must never diminish their heads, nor be at all busy with their roots, which pierce deep, and is all their foundation.
Evelyn. On Forest Trees, c. 21.

CONJOIN, v. Conjo'ining, n. Conjo'int, adj. Conjoi'ntly. Conju'nct, adj. Conju'nction. Conju'nctive. Conju'nctively. Conju'nctly. Conju'ncture. Fr. Conjoindre; Sp. Conjuntar; Lat. Conjungere, to put, place or bring together; con, and jungere, quasi in unum agere, to join or unite together. See Join.

"Fr. Conjoindre,—to conjoin, (connect,) combine, couple, co-unite; to joyn, associate; fasten, knit; marry, make sure with or together," (Cotgrave.)

Conjuncture is now used emphatically, for a combination of important, critical circumstances.

But oft hir wittes ben made blynde,
Ad oneliche of this ake poynte,
That hir abydyng is conioynte
Forth with the body for to dwell.—Gower. Con. A. b. vii.

He loketh the coniunccions,
He loketh the recepcions,
His signe, his houre, his ascendent. Id. Ib. b. vi.

And the cause, why the poete conioyneth experience and memorye together (as it were in a lefulle matrimonye, experience begettynge, and memorie alwaye producynge that incomparable fruite, called sapience) is, for that memorie in her operation properlye succedeth experience.
Sir T. Elyot. The Governour, b. ii. c. 22.

In such wyse temperyng and qualifying his infinite power and vertue to the measure and capacitie of manne's nature, that it mai be hable to abyde the metyng together & conioynyng therof.—Udall. Luke, c. 1.

All that he had done with King Lewys in his ambusade for the coniogning of this new affinitie, was both frustrate and vaine.—Grafton. Edw. IV. an. 4.

Therefore no man can defile his owne bodye with any maner of superstition, but he doth separat himself, from that conionction and vnió wherby we ar made the members of the Sonne of God.—Calvine. Foure Godlie Sermons, S. 1.

Wherin Saint Hierome was rather contente to loyn the latine coniunction with the Greke woorde, and call it compresbiter, thē to chaunge that woorde signifying the office into seniores and consenior, signifying but the age.
Sir T. More. Workes, p. 426.

The emperor like a wise prince, seying then the aspect of the planet reygned contrary to hys purpose, ceased for to talke of that matter any more till an other daye when the coniunccion should be in more meker signes stirynge to peace.—Hall. Hen. IV. an. 4.

These broiles haue oft my cheekes with teares bedew'd,
My heart is rent, my hope bereau'd, my ioys are gone,
My life is lost, if you confoune not both in one.
Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 93.

Some traditions rely but upon single testimony at first, and yet descending upon others, come to be attested by many, whose testimony though conjunct, yet in value is but single, because it relies upon the first single relator, and so can have no greater authority, or certainty, than they derive from the single person.
Bp. Taylor. Liberty of Prophesying, s. 5.

Nestorius teaching rightly that God and man are distinct natures, did thereupon misinferre that in Christ those natures can by no coniunction make one person.
Hooker. Eccles. Politie, b. v. § 52.

And indeed I am induc'd fully to this understanding of St. Paul's words by the conjunctive particle [δὲ] which he uses.—Bp. Taylor, vol. i. Ser. 23.

Let them be considered, root and branch, first severally, then conjunctively.—Fuller. Worthies. Oxfordshire.

Their office is as well severally as conjunctly to watch with diligence over the flock committed to their charge, both publickly and privately, that no corruption of religion or manners grow amongst them.
Spotswood. Church of Scotland, an. 1575.

You see now what power was acquir'd in civil matters by the conjuncture of philosophy and divinity.
Hobbs. Behemoth, pt. ii.

I considered that also the actions of men, which singly are inconsiderable, after many conjunctures, grow at last either into one great protecting power, or into two great destroying factions.—Id. On Sir W. D'Avenant's Preface.

Thus the feet of the otter are made, the toes being all conjoyned with membranes as the feet of geese and ducks are.—Derham. Physico-Theology, b. vi. c. 1. Note 3.

Hence, v. 8, he exhorts them to be united in friendship one to another, that with one heart and one voice they might conjointly glorify God, and receive one another with the same good will that Christ has received the Jews.
Locke. On Romans, s. 13. c. 14. Note 7.

So they made no advances till the Duke of Marlborough came back, who carried over Lord Viscount Townsend, to be conjunct plenipotentiary with himself, reckoning the load too great to bear it wholly on himself.
Burnet. Own Time, an. 1709.

Heaven (that hath plac'd this island to give law
To balance Europe, and her states to awe)
In this conjunction doth on Britain smile,
The greatest lender, and the greatest isle.
Waller. A Panegyric to my Lord Protector.

They must be understood conjunctly, so as always to go together, ask so as to seek, seek so as to knock: that is, as St. Paul expresseth it, a man must continue instant in prayer.—Bp. Beveridge, vol. i. Ser. 31.

——— Who from our looms
Take largely for themselves, and for those tribes
Of Indians, ancient tenants of the land,
In amity conjoin'd, of civil life
The comforts taught, and various new desires,
Which kindle arts, and occupy the poor.
Dyer. The Fleece, b iv.

She and the sun with influence conjoint
Wield the huge axle of the whirling earth,
And from their just direction turn the poles,
Slow urging on the progress of the years.
Glover. On Sir Isaac Newton.

I'll try to come with my supplies;
To muster up my sober aid,
What time your lively pow'rs invade;
To act conjointly in the war
On dulness, whom we both abhor.
Smart. Reason & Imagination.

Finding King James irremediably excluded, he voted for the conjunctive sovereignty, upon this principle, that he thought the title of the prince and his consort equal, and it would please the prince their protector to have a share in the sovereignty.—Johnson. Life of Sheffield.

But I will neither ostentatiously display my own endeavours to assist you in this conjuncture nor dwell upon the unworthy treatment you have received from others.
Melmoth. Cicero, b. i. Let. 16.

CO'NJUGATE, v. Co'njugate, n. Conjuga'tion, Co'njugal. Conjuga'lity. Co'njugally. Lat. Conjugare, (con, and jugum.) See Conjoin, and Join.

To put, place or bring under the same yoke; to join, couple, or unite.

Conjugal is applied to the union—by marriage; connubial, matrimonial.

"Conjugation doth as it were yoake, and couple verbs together with their moods, tenses, and declinings, under one and the same theme," (Minshew.)

Can skantly the tensis of his conjugations.
Skelton. Speak Parrot.

I was neuer discontented with your former allegacion out of Saynte Augustyne, concernyng vowes singular, quod alius vouit castitatem coniugalem, that some men voweth coniugall chastyte, or faythfull clennesse in marryage.
Bale. Apology, fol. 64.

He shall set naught by ye God of his fathers, neither shall he regarde the coniugale sone in wedlock, nor sette awght by any God at all, for he shall exalt himself aboue all thinges.
Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, c. 12.

For those drawing as well marriage as wardship, gave him both power and occasion to conjugate at pleasure the Norman and the Saxon houses, which by degrees might prove a second conquest of affections, harder than the first.
Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 101.

But now it is no new wonder but a pursuance of the same conjugation of great and divine things, that the fame and religion of Jesus was with so incredible swiftness scattered over the face of the habitable world, from one end of the earth unto the other.—Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conse. b. i. c. 4.

But I must also observe other great conjugations of mercy; for he that is to pass through an infinite, must not dwell upon every little line of life.—Id. vol. ii. Ser. 26.

Whether his first design be to withdraw
Our fealty from God, or to disturb
Conjugal love, then which perhaps no bliss
Enjoy'd by us excites his envy more:
Or this, or worse, leave not the faithful side
That gave thee being, still shades thee and protects.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. ix.

And if it be true both in divinity and law, that consent alone, though copulation never follow, makes a marriage, how can they dissolve it for the want of that which made it not, and not dissolve it for that not continuing which made it, and should preserve it in love and reason, and difference it from a brute conjugality.—Id. Tetrachordon.

Such a hater looses by the due punishment that privilege, Deut. xxiv. 1, to divorce for a natural dislike; which, though it could not love conjugally, yet sent away civilly, and with just conditions.—Id. Colasterion.

All the various mixtures and conjugations of atoms do beget nothing but new inward texture and alteration of surface.—Bentley, Ser. 2.

I do not wonder at your lordship's being terrified with the account that has been given you of the number of conjugations in the Greek language; but I hope you will instantly recover your spirits upon being told, that, instead of thirteen, they are but two.—Sharpe. Of the Greek Tongue, Let. 7.

Whenever an action is good and virtuous, it is not only natural, but carries with it a felicity flowing from and essential to the very nature of it. Paternal, conjugal, filial affection, are they not full of delights?
Hoadly. Letters signed Britannicus, Let. 94.

In lifeless strains let vulgar satire tell
That marriage oft is mixt with heav'n and hell;
That conjugal delight is sour'd with spleen,
And peace and war compose the varied scene:
My Muse a truth sublimer can assert,
And sing the triumphs of a mutual heart.
Blackmore. Extempore Verses.

CONJU'NCTION. See Conjoin.

CONJU'RE, v. Conju're, n. Co'njurer. Co'njuring, n. Conju'rement. Conjura'tion. Conju'rator. Fr. Conjurer; Sp. Conjurar; It. Congiurare; Lat. Conjurare; simul jurare, et alterum alteri promittere fidem; to swear together, and each to pledge his fidelity to the other: (con, and jurare, to swear.) See Jury.

To swear together; to bind themselves by an oath to some common purpose; to complot, to conspire, to confederate, to combine.

To call upon with the solemnity of an oath; with zeal, with fervour; to beg or beseech, to supplicate or entreat earnestly.

"The conjurer," says Minshew, "seemeth by praiers and invocation of God's powerful names to compel the devil to say or doe what he commandeth him."

But Ihesus was stille and the prince of prestis seide to him, I conjure thi bi the lyvinge God that thou seye to us if thou art Crist the Sone of God.—Wiclif. Matthew, c. 26

And in lyke manner of the leapers thou canst proue nothing: thou canst neuer conjure out confession thence, howbeit thou hast an handsome example there.
Tyndall. Workes, p. 15.

And in the end he repeteth how he conjured God in Horeb, and overcame him with prayer, where thou mayest learne the right maner to pray.—Id. Ib. p. 22.

——— And first the watch is slain
Then gates vnfold to let their fellows in.
They bind themselves with the conjured bands.
Surrey. Virgile. Æneis, b. ii.

Whē such an image or idolous prince is thus vp set or constituted by authoritie (this oath once made that he shall alwayes defende them) he maye in no wyse speake, but oute of that spirit yt their coniures, cōfessours I should say, haue put into him.—Bale. Image, pt. i.

In coniuring of holy water they pray, that whosoeuer be sprinckled therewith may receaue health as well of body as of soule, and likewise in makyng holy bread and so forth in the coniurations of other ceremonies.
Tyndall. Workes, p. 156.

I cal him a good counsaylor, which (as Cæsar sayth in the conjuration of Catiline) whiles he counselleth in doubtfull matters, is voyde of all hate, friendshyppe, displeasure, or pitie.—Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. iii. c. 28.

And by that meanes searche foorth and investigate, the whole intent of their coniuration, and after what waye they intended to proceede in the same.—Hall. Hen. VII. an. 9.

Both these Williams before rehersed were rather taken of suspicion and ielowsie, because they were nere of bloud to the coniurators, then for any proued offence or crime.
Grafton. Hen. VII. an. 29.

For it was not very easye to vnderstand, who were the coniuratours and complices or partakers in that same sect.
Nicoll. Thucydides, fol. 212.

He [Pausanias] fled vnto the city of Heraclea, where there was a temple that conjured dead spirits, and there was the spirit of Cleomenes conjured to pray her to be contented.
North. Plutarch. p. 412.

——— And in proud rebellious arms
Drew after him the third part of heav'ns sons
Conjur'd against the highest.—Milton. Par. Lost, b. ii.

As for science, or certain rules of their actions, they are so far from it, that they know not what it is. Geometry they have thought conjuring.—Hobbs. Of Man, pt. i. c. 5.

If ever we could have hoped to have been informed of the reason of the present advantages allowed to the wicked, it should have been when the prophet Jeremy (one sanctified even in his mother's womb) did so earnestly ask God this question, with a conjuration upon his justice, saying, Lord, thou art just when I argue with thee; yet let me talk with thee of thy judgments: wherefore doth the way of the wicked prosper? wherefore are all they happy that deal treacherously?—Mountagne. Devoute Essayes, Treat. 16.

Whilst in this mill wee labour and turne round
As in a conjurer's circle, William found
A meanes for our deliverance: "Turn your cloakes"
Quoth he, "for Puck is busy in these oakes."
Corbet. Iter Boreale.

Nevertheless, to write now the reforming of education, though it be one of the greatest and noblest designs that can be thought on, and for the want whereof this nation perishes, I had not yet at this time been induced, but by your earnest entreaties, and serious conjurements.—Milton. Of Education.

In this month of May, certain persons, no good friends, as it seems to Queen Mary, had meetings together, to calculate what should befall the queen (perhaps) and her issue and used unlawful arts of conjuring and witchcraft.
Strype. Memorials. Queen Mary, an. 1555.

And hereupon certain men, June 5, were commissionated to proceed to further examination of these conjurours upon such points as they should gather out of their former confessions touching their lewd and vain practices.—Id. Ib.

My little fields within doors, though by their novelty they appear too extravagant to you to subsist even in a regular imagination, are in the effect things that require no conjuration.—Tatler, No. 203.

As the Druid worship paid the highest respect to the elements of fire and water, it was very natural that they, who abounded with so many conjurations for the discovery of doubtful facts or future events, should make use of these elements in their divination.

To cause to be, or make natural; agreeable to nature; to the same nature.

Connate.—Born together, or at the same time with.

First in man's life we find an appetite
To learn and know the truth of ev'ry thing,
Which is co-natural, and born with it,
And from the essence of the soul doth spring.
Davies. Immortality of the Soul, R. 1. s. 30.

I yield it just, said Adam, and submit.
But is there yet no other way, besides
These painful passages, how we may come
To death, and mix with our connatural dust?
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. xi.

Iron in a particular sympathie moves to the loadstone, but yet if it exceed a certain quantitie, it forsakes those affections, and like a good citizen & a true patriot, moves to the earth, which is the region and country of its connaturalis.—Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, b. vii. c. 1.

There are also some principles which are indeed naturally known, that is, by principles of natural reason: but because they are not the immediate principles of our creation and proper being, they have the same truth, and the same seat, and the same certainty; but not the same prime evidence, and connaturality to the soul.
Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. i. c. 1.

Though there is no commensurableness between this object and a created understanding, yet there is a congruity and connaturality between them.
Hale. Origination of Mankind, p 12.

These and some such common notions seem connaturally engraven in the soul, antecedently to discursive ratiocination.—Id. Ib. p. 61.

Yet there was in Sir Henry such a propensity and connaturalness to the Italian language, and those studies, whereof Gentilis was a great master, that this friendship between them did dayly increase.—Walton. Life of Sir H. Wotton.

But they made a shift to gather up her [Truth] scattered limbs, which as soon as they came together, by a strange sympathy and connaturalness, presently united into a lovely and beautiful body.—Bust. Funeral Sermon. On Bp. Taylor.

How often have you been forced to swallow sickness, to drink dead palsies and foaming epilepsies, to render your intemperances familiar to you—before ever you could connaturalize your midnight revels to your temper.
Scott. Christ. Life, vol. I. p. 4.

And this the practice of Christians hath acknowledged, who have baptized these geminous births and double connascencies with several names.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iii. c. 15.

'Tis [as it were] the first dawning of the spirit upon the soul, in those connate principles born with us into the world, and discovering, though very imperfectly, some general truths.—South, vol. ii. Ser. 10.

The very sound of his [Virgil] words has often somewhat that is connatural to the subject.
Dryden. Annus Mirabilis. Account of the Poem.

If this be true, it is impossible the nature of such beings should be expressed, or the least essential property be any way imitated, while between the medium and themselves there is nothing connatural.—Harris. Hermes, b. iii. c. 3.

The high and mightie Prince Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, &c. agreed him to put and putteth all maner matters and quarrells in deede, with all their incidentes circumstaunces, dependentes and connexes, that touchen hym and hys persone.—Hall. Hen. VI. an. 4.

All my thought, care & study is (you noble princes and men of high honor) to inuent the meane, study & way, how both my kyngdomes by the benefite of Almightie God enlarged & amplified, by the connexyng & ioyngyng the one to the other may be left to my posteritie cleane & pure with out domestical dissencion or ciuile discord.
Id. Hen. V. an. 8.

For as it is an aphorism most true, so is it also very closely conner with piety and religion; and such a philosophy we are to expect from so holy a man as Moses.
More. Philosophick Cabbala, App. c. 8.

But above all, let this be observed (which is the grace and spirit of civile history,) that the causes and consultations be connexed, with the events.
Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, b. ii. c. 4.

——— My heart divin'd,
My heart, which by a secret harmonie
Still moues with thine, join'd in connexion sweet.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. x.

But the most noble and profitable invention of all other, was that of speech, consisting of names and appellations, and their connexion, whereby men register their thoughts; recal them when they are past; and also declare them one to another for mutual utility and conversation.
Hobbs. Of Man, c. 4.

The consectary which flows from thence, and altogether depends thereon, is manifestly brought in by this connexive particle Therefore, (Gen. ii. 24.)—Milton. Tetrachordon.

What other cause the frame could so contrive,
That when tempestuous winds the ocean drive
They cannot break the tie, nor disunite
The waves which roll connected in their flight?
Blackmore. The Creation, b. i.

So much good method and connection may
Improve the common and the plainest things.
Roscommon. Horace. Art of Poetry.

This history [Milton's] when it first came abroad, had only the reputation of the putting of our old authors neatly together in a connex'd story, not abstaining from some lashes at the ignorance, or I know not what, of those times
Wood. Fasti Oxon.

——— Intermixt with these

B. Jonson. The Magnetick Lady, Act iv. sc. 4.

Heresie, conscious of her owne injustice, could be content to goe away with a leg, or an arme of sound principles, as hoping to make up the rest with her owne mixtures. Truth cannot abide to part with a joynt, and will rather endure to leese all by violence, than a piece through a willing connivency.—Bp. Hall. Cont. Salomon's Choice.

All sins which we give allowance to, being committed, or not hindered by us if we may, are ours, as if we committed them; first commanders, abettors, counsellours, consenters, commenders, connivers, concealers; not hinderers; each of these will be found guilty before God's tribunal.
Junius. Sin. Stigm. (1639.) p. 825.

Do not think that Christ will patronise or connive at any of your sins which you live in; or that he will save you, whether you repent or no.—Bp. Beveridge, vol. ii. Ser. 89.

The rest of the vices in St. Paul's black list, which were not warm'd at their altars, and fostered in their temples, were yet by the connivance of the law cherish'd in their private houses, and made a part of the uncondemned actions of common life.—Locke. Rom. c. 5. s. 5. Note.

Now the earth being such a one, and all its parts having an equal propension, or connivency to the centre, they must needs be in greatest rest, and most immoveable when they are all equi-distant from it.—Ray. On the Creation, pt. ii.

In many of them, the directors were heartily concurring, in most of them, they were encouraging, and sometimes commanding; in all they were conniving.
Burke. On Mr. Fox's East India Bill.

Government will not perhaps soon arrive at such purity and excellence, but that some connivance at least will be indulged to the triumphant robber and successful cheat.

Johnson. The Falkland Islands.

CONNOISSE'UR. } Fr. Cognoistre, to know.
CONNOISSE'URSHIP. } See COGNITION. Connoisseur is generally applied to—

One who has skill and judgment in the arts; in matters of taste.

These arts of speech the guides and marshals are;
But logic leadeth reason in a dance,
Reason the connoisseur and bright load star,
In this world's sea t' avoid the rock of chance.

Davies. On Dancing.

Your lesson learn'd you'll be secure
To get the name of connoisseur;
And when your merits once are known,
Procure disciples of your own. Swift. On Poetry.

If therefore, in the course of this inquiry, we can shew that there are rules for the conduct of the artist, which are fixed and invariable, it follows of course, that the art of the connoisseur, or, in other words, taste, has likewise invariable principles.—Sir J. Reynolds, Dis. 7.

I leave to learned fingers, and wise hands,
The artist and his ape, to teach and tell
How well his connoisseurship understands
The graceful bend, and the voluptuous swell:
Let these describe the undescribable.

CO'NNOTE, v. } Lat. Con, and notare, to
CO'NNOTATE. } mark. Notare, from notum,
CONNOTA'TION. } known. See NOTE.

To mark, signify or designate one thing in conjunction with another; to co-signify; and (as is now more commonly used) to denote, (qv.)

Then saye I nowe that in Englād this woorde congregacyon didde neuer signifie the noumber of Christen people, as Christen people with a connotacyon or consyderacyon of theyr fayth or Chrystendome.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 417.

The very metaphor used by the apostle, and chose out here as ex proposito to express himself by, viz. Not to be found naked, doth secretly, and yet most elegantly connotate (together with, and over and above all that else hath been spoken of the import of it) the very separate state of an ungodly soul, now come out of the body, to be the very subject he is a speaking of.—Goodwin. Works, vol. v. pt. iii. p. 43.

It is inferred that therefore his repentance was withall significantly connotated thereby.—Id. Ib. vol. iii pt. i. p. 456.

[This faith] doth also connote, and imply (indeed comprehend according to the meaning of those who use the word) such acts of will, as, supposing those persuasions to be real and complete, are naturally consequent upon them, and are in a manner necessarily coherent with them.

Barrow, vol. ii. Ser. 4.

CONNU'BIAL. Lat. Connubialis; con, and nubere, id est, operire, to cover. Nubis instar velare ac tegere, (Vossius.) See NUPTIAL.

Perfaining to the state of matrimony, marriage or wedlock; matrimonial, conjugal.

Elfrida's beauty; but deluded, dy'd
In height of hopes. Philips. Cider, b. i.

There is at least this reason, why we should be less deceived in our connubial hopes than many, who enter into the same state, that we have allowed our minds to form no unreasonable expectations, nor vitiated our fancies, in the soft hours of courtship, with visions of felicity, which human power cannot bestow.—Rambler, No. 167.

CONNUMERA'TION. Lat. Con, and numerare, atum, to count. See NUMBER.

A counting together.

How could he otherwise have missed the opportunity of insisting upon the connumeration of the three persons, the assertion of their joint testimony and of their unity.

Bp. Hall, b. iii. Sat. 7.

It has been observed of Greece, that when it was subdued by the Romans, itself subdued its conquerors, softened their savage temper and refined their manners; and afterwards of the Romans themselves, that wherever they conquered, they in some degree civilized the world.

Law. Theory of Religion, p. 95.

Let a man apply to this work, by frequent returns, and short intervals, while the heap is small, and the particulars few, and he will find it easy and conquerable.

South, vol. ii. Ser. 11.

Revenge is one of the most importunate and violent [passions] that are incident to human nature; which yet we are sure is conquerable under all the strongest temptations to it, that can well be conceived, from the account of good David.

Atterbury, vol. iii. Ser. 4.

O Queen, have mercy! freely we acknowledge
That, nor our ointment, nor ought else on earth,
Thy unresisted fury can restrain,
O mighty conqueress of human kind!

West. Triumphs of the Gout.

One thing however is clear. There were conquerors, and conquests in those days; and consequently, all that devastation, by which they are formed, and all that oppression, by which they are maintained.

Burke. A Vindication of Natural Society.

What we call purchase, perquisitio, the feudists called conquest, conquæstus, or conquisitio: both denoting any means of acquiring an estate out of the common course of inheritance. And this is still the proper phrase in the law of Scotland: as it was among the Norman jurists, who styled the first purchaser (that is he who brought the estate into the family who at present owns it) the conqueror or conquereur. Which seems to be all that was meant by the appellation which was given to William the Norman.

Blackstone. Commentaries, b. ii. c. 15.

Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, c. 2.

They keepe the first and second degrees of consanguinitie inuiolable as we do: but they haue no regard to the degrees of affinity: for they will marrie together or by succession, two sisters.—Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 99.

Am not I consanguinious? Am not I of her blood?

Shakespeare. Twelfth Night, Act ii. sc. 3.

They [the Jewish Church] accounted a proselyte to be, to all intents and purposes, so new born, that they judged him, from henceforward a perfect stranger to all his natural relations, even to that degree, that he might lawfully marry with such persons as, before his being a proselyte, he could not, by reason of consanguinity or affinity, contract matrimony with.

Sharp, vol. iii. Ser. 13.

Conscience is the name given to that, (sc. faculty or power, feeling or sentiment,) by which we see, look, within ourselves; by which we see, look, or examine into our thoughts; by which we distinguish, discern, ascertain, assure ourselves of, know,—right from wrong.

A conscientious man is one who is guided and directed by a well-meaning, a good conscience. See particularly the examples from Taylor, South, and Sharp.

For oure glorie is this, the witnessyng of oure conscience, that in symplenesse and clennesse of God and not in fleischli wisdom but in the grace of God we lyuyden in this world, but more plenteousli to ghou.—Wiclif. 2 Corynth. c. 1.

But sore wept she if on of hem [his small houndes] were dede,
Or if men smote it with a yerde smert:
And all was conscience and tendre herte.—Chaucer. Prol.

[Cordelilla] sayd, most reuerent Fader where my ii susters haue disxymulyd with the, with theyr plesaunt wordes fruteles, I knowynge ye great loue and faderly zele that towarde me euer before this tyme thou hast borne, (for which I may not speke to ye otherwyse than my cōscyence ledyth me) Therefore I say to the, fader, I haue loued the euer as my fader, and shall cōtinuelly, whyle I lyue, loue ye as my naturall fader.—Fabyan, vol. i. c. 14.

Wherefore they were afrayd lest his innocēt blode wolde be auenged and required at their handis, & therefore to be defended, they (as now do all sicke) lyke combrouse conscienced clerkis and bishopes, be settinge vp of these their baners and images of the emprours and kinges contend and stewe to gette their fauour, but all was in vayne.

Joye. Exposition of Daniel, c. 9.

So they play the dissemblers with the church of God by their facte, offending the godly, whome eyther they prouoke to fall with them, or make more carelesse and conscienceless if they be fallen.—Fox. Martyrs. Bradford's Letter.

He [God] hath given us conscience to be in God's stead to us, to give us laws, and to exact obedience of those laws, to punish them, that prevaricate, and to reward the obedient. And therefore conscience is called the Household Guardian, the Domestick God, the Spirit or Angel of the place: and when we call God to witness, we only mean, that our conscience is right, and that God and God's vicar, our conscience, knows it.—Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. i. c. 1.

Else, what could a handful of gummers have done in the sight of a hecatombe? or, how might I appeare at this altar, except with those affections, that no lesse love the light and witnesse, than they have the conscience of your vertue?

B. Jonson. The Alchemist. To the Lady Wroth.

Yet with his forraign hearte she does begin
To treat of love her most unstudy'd theame,
And like young conscienc'd casuists, thinks that sin,
Which will by talk and practice lawfull seeme.
Davenant. Gondibert, b. ii. c. 7.

One thousand pounds well nigh were due to him [Dr. Hammond] at his death; yet there appeared neither specialty nor any man's hand amongst his writings; so confident he was that his conscientious debtors would faithfully pay what was freely lent them.—Fuller. Worthies. Surrey.

He considered that vengeance belonged to God, which concluded him conscientiously obliged not to take it into his own hands.—Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 181.

Indeed if the minister's part be rightly discharg'd, it renders the people more conscionable, quiet and easy to be govern'd, if otherwise, his life and doctrine will declare him.
Milton. Reformation in England, b. ii.

See, sir, your mortgage which I only took,
In case you and your son had in the wars
Miscarried I yield it up again; 'tis yours.
Cas. Are you so conscionable!
Beaum. & Fletch. The Lawes of Candy, Act i. sc. 1.

So that let him beare himselfe in his chronicle as vprightlie and as conscionablie as he may possible, yet he shall be sure to find them that will be more prest to blab foorth his pellish faults, than they will be readie to blaze out his good deserts.
Holinshed. Ireland. Stanihurst to Sir Henry Sidnese.

6. There be four things a minister should be at, the conscionary part, Ecclesiastical story, school divinity, and the casuists.
1st, In the conscionary part, he must read all the chief fathers, both Latin and Greek wholly.—Selden. Table Talk.

We see in Augustus Cæsar, who was rather diverse from his uncle, than inferior in virtue, how when he died, he desired his friends about him to give him a plaudite, as if he were conscious to himself that he had played his part well upon the stage.—Bacon. Advancement of Learning, b. ii.

Whereas suspition is as oft begot out of conscioussnesse in ourselves either of what we have done or would practise, as it was from the sense of other men's failinge.
Feltham, pt. i. Res. 42.

Conscience is a Latin word (though with an English termination) and, according to the very notation of it, imports a double or joint knowledge; to wit, one of a Divine law or rule, and the other of a man's own action: and so is properly the application of a general law, to a particular instance of practice.—South, vol. ii. Ser. 12.

Conscience, taken in general, is nothing else but a man's judgment or persuasion concerning moral good or evil, or concerning what he ought to do, and what he ought not to do, and what he lawfully may do.—Sharp, vol. iii. Ser. 16.

But besides the future reward of a holy and conscientious course, which is unspeakable and full of glory; it hath also this present fruit, this earnest, as I may say, and ready money in hand, the peace and satisfaction of our own minds, which is more valuable than thousands of gold and silver.
Tillotson, vol. i. Ser. 38.

Nor can force be lawfully used upon your principles, to bring any man to either of them, because such things are required to their communion, which not being requisite to salvation, men may seriously and conscientiously differ, and be in doubt about, without endangering their souls.
Locke. A third Letter of Toleration.

'Twill be a wonderful conscientiousness in them, no where, that I know to be parallel'd, if they will content themselves with less profit than they can make.
Id. Further Considerations on the Value of Money.

So there be a devout, industrious, and modest search after the truths of Scripture proportionably to the abilities and opportunities that God vouchsafes, and a conscionable conforming of our lives to our discoveries, it is much to be hoped, that we may miss a great many theological truths without missing salvation.—Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 48. Life.

The experience of the primitive and heroical ages of the church does gloriously manifest, that the inducements and dissuasives held forth in the Bible, though destitute of those embellishments and advantages, where they are conscionably entertained, and seriously pondered, are sufficient to raise virtue to a pitch philosophy durst scarcely aim at.
Id. Ib. vol. ii. p. 268.

As many months as I sustain'd her hate,
So many years is she condemn'd by fate
To daily death; and every several place,
Conscious of her disdain and my disgrace,
Must witness her just punishment; and be
A scene of triumph and revenge to me.
Dryden. Theodore & Honoria.

But it is farther enquir'd, whether it be the same identical substance? This few would think they had reason to doubt of, if these perceptions, with their consciousness, always remain'd present in the mind, whereby the same thinking thing would be always consciously present, and, as would be thought, evidently the same to itself.
Locke. Of Human Understanding, b. ii. c. 27.

Consciousness is the perception of what passes in a man's own mind.—Id. Ib. b. ii. c. 1.

Let us consider the world therefore as God's great family; and ourselves as servants in that family, as acting immediately, whatever our situations are, under our great master; and of discharging the several offices, which he hath assigned, with a conscientious regard to our duty.
Gilpin, vol. i. Ser. 5.

But still many may be of a different opinion, who may conscientiously believe the doctrines, and practise the duties of the gospel, whether they see them shadowed out in the Psalms or not.—Bp. Horne. On the Psalms, Pref.

The conscionsness of your merit must always incline you to believe, it is envy alone can be silent in your praise; as on the other side you cannot imagine me so weak, as to desire to be transmitted to posterity by any hand, which could not secure to himself the same glory it bestowed.
Melmoth. Cicero, b. i. Let. 20.

CONSCRIBE, v. Co'nscript, n. Co'nscript, adj. Conscri'ption. } Fr. Conscrit; It. Conscritto; Sp. Conscripto; Lat. Conscribere, conscriptum, (con, and scribere, to write.) Verbum militare cum novi milites scribuntur; et in decurias describuntur, (Ernest.)

To write, (sc.) upon tables—the name of those, who were chosen to serve as soldiers; and thus, to enroll, to enlist; and, in old English to bill, (qv.) And see the quotation from Adam.

Conscript and conscription have become words of common use.

This armie (whiche was not smalle) was conscribed and come together to Harfleete, at the mouth of the riuer of Seyne, expecting wind and weather.—Hall. Edw. IV. an. 9.

He conscribed and prepared a new host, and with all the studye and industrye, that he could practise, or vse, he hnagened how to compasse Thomas Lord Stanley, which had maryed his syster, that he might be one of the confederacy and coniuracion.— Id. Ib. an. 9.

And so in doyng his errand in the name of all that prouince, he sayed these wordes, O fathers conscripte, O happie people.—Golden Boke, Let. 11.

Not having any gallies there but three, which lay on dry land unrigged, as they have done a long time past, none assembly of the states of that land, none order, provision of victual, towardness in conscription of men of war, or appearance of such thing.
Burnet. Rec. b. ii. No. 23. The Cardinal. On Divorce.

Such as were chosen into the senate by Brutus, after the expulsion of Tarquin the Proud, to supply the place of those whom that king had slain were called Conscripti, i. e. persons scribes or enrolled together with the old senators, who alone were properly styled patres.—Adam. Rom. Antiq.

CO'NSECRATE, v. Co'nsecrate, adj. Consecra'tion. Co'nsecrator. Co'nsecratory. } Fr. Consacrer; It. Consagrare; Sp. Consagrar; Lat. Consecrare, (con, and sacrare, q. sacrum facere,) to make, or cause to be, holy or sacred.

To hallow, to dedicate, to devote unto, to set apart for the service or honour of. See the quotation from Hobbs.

And therefore hee decreed, that the byshops should consecrate no sub deacon, except hee woulde first vow chastitie. This is openly in the Pope's lawe.—Barnes. Workes, p. 331.

Being a mã of the laitee he entred into the temple of God, nor was any thing afeard to eat the consecrate loaues.
Udal. Luke, c. 6.

Dyuerse of them asked hym in great anger, Whether it were meteriall breade after the consecracyon or not? Then loked the Lord Cobham earnestly vppon the archbishop, and sayde, "I beleue, surely that it is Chryste's bodye in fourme of breade; sir, beleue not you thus?" And the archbisshoppe sayd, "Yes mary do I."
State Trials. Sir John Oldcastle, an. 1463.

To consecrate, is in Scripture, to offer, give, or dedicate, in pious and decent language and gesture, a man, or any other thing, to God, by separating it from common use; that is to say, to sanctify and make it God's, and to be used only by those, whom God hath appointed to be his public ministers, and thereby to change, not the thing consecrated, but only the use of it, from being profane and common, to be holy and peculiar to God's service.
Hobbs. Leviathan, pt. iv. c. 44.

All things are God's already, we can give him no right by consecrating any, that he had not before, only we set it apart to his service.—Selden. Table Talk.

Next morn the bishops twaine, the heremite,
And all the clarks and priests of lesse estate,
Did in the middest of the campe vnite
Within a place for prayer consecrate.
Fairefax. Godfrey of Boulogne, b. xi. s. 4.

And therefore Moses consecrated Aaron, agitatus a deo consecrationis principe, saith Dionysius, Moses performed the external rites of designation, but God was the consecrator.—Bp. Taylor. The Office Ministerial, s. 6.

Think with yourselves, whether it is not really a great mercy and kindness to all of us, that one day in the week is, by a public law, consecrated to a holy rest.
Sharp, vol. iv. Ser 14.

But when the state should hap to reel,
'Twas to submit to fatal steel,
And fall, as it was consecrate,
A sacrifice to fall of state.—Hudibras, pt. i. c. 1.

But that no designs might be carried on, which they should not understand, never was there such an invention to that purpose, as auricular confession: and yet that the people may have greater reverence to their priests, they are told, that they can make their God at any time by pronouncing the five words of consecration.
Stillingfleet, vol. ii. Ser. 2.

To this [the prayer for the state of Christ's church,] the consecratory prayer which we now use was joined as a part of it,—And it was ordered, that the whole office of the communion, except the consecratory prayer, should be used on all holy-days, when there was no communion, to put the people in mind of it, and of the sufferings of Christ
Burnet. History of Reformation, an. 1548.

That sense [continued sense of mankind] not only, like a wise architect, hath built up the august fabrick of states, but like a provident proprietor, to preserve the structure from prophanation and ruin, as a sacred temple, purged from all the impurities of fraud, and violence, and injustice, and tyranny, hath solemnly and for ever consecrated the commonwealth, and all that obtains in it.
Burke. On the French Revolution.

This consecration is made, that all who administer in the government of men, in which they stand in the person of God himself, should have high and worthy notions of their function and destination.—Id. Ib.

CONSE'CTARY, adj. Conse'ctary, n. } Lat. Consequi, (con, and sequi, to follow.) See below Consecute.

Following, consequent.

Of which the natural consectary is, that to resolve a phænomenon into sympathy, is not always to take sanctuary in the Asylum of Fools.—H. More. The Preface general, p. 14.

No argument but causes enter the definition; a consectary is but the effect of those causes.—Milton. Tetrachordon.

Thus he endeavours to entangle truths: and when he cannot possibly destroy its substance, he cunningly confounds its apprehensions; that from the inconsistent and contrary determinations thereof, consectary impieties, and hopeful conclusions may arise, there's no such thing at all.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. i. c. 10.

To follow close after, to pursue, to overtake, to come up with, to reach, to attain, to gain.

Fr. Consécution,—a consequence or consequent; an order, succession, following; a necessary issue or ensuing, (Cotgrave.)

Which his grace accepteth, as touching your merits and acquittal in no less good and thankful part, than if ye finding the disposition of things in more direct state, had consecuted all your pursuits and desires.—Burnet. Records, b. ii. No. 25. Cardinal concerning the Divorce.

But on the tother side likewise as this argumẽt or consecution is trew, God saith yᵗ who so believe not hys church, is to be taken as a painim, ergo that thing is trew; so is this consecution trew, Chryste's church sayth yᵗ who so breake hys vow of chastyte sinneth deadly, and who so holdeth it for lefull holdeth an hereste, ergo these twoo thinges be trewe.
Sir T. More. Workes, p. 434.

For the force of consecutions is many times very deceitfull, and such as may easily betray our discourse.
Bp. Hall. Christian Moderation, b. ii. s. 11.

I shall only advertise the reader of two things; the one, that the Dutch did, indeed, make three consecutive voyages to Nova Zembla.—Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 477.

But, having for this purpose exposed some serum of human blood to cold air, consecutively, the serum was not found to congeal, though some grumous parts of the same blood did, as has formerly been noted.—Id. Ib. vol iv. p 751.

In the structure and order of the poem, not only the greater parts are properly consecutive, but the didactic and illustrative paragraphs are so happily mingled, that labour is relieved by pleasure, and the attention is led on through a long succession of varied excellence to the original position, the fundamental principle of wisdom and virtue.

To think and feel as others think and feel; to be of the same mind, opinion, thoughts or sentiments; to accord, to concord, to harmonize, to agree; and thus—to accede, to concur, to allow to admit, to grant, to concede, to yield.

Consense,—a sense or feeling in union, combination or association with some other sense or feeling.

The next gere folowand of Edward coronment,
Leulyn of Walisland into France he sent,
The Mountfort douhter to weddu, hir frendes alle consent.
R. Brunne, p. 236.

And what consent to the temple of God with mawmetis.
Wiclif. 2 Corynth. c. 6.

Here now ye sen, that dedly sinne hath first suggestion of the fende, as sheweth here by the adder, and afterward the delit of the flesh, as sheweth here by Eve; and after that the consenting of reson, as sheweth by Adam.
Chaucer. The Persones Tale.

There is an olde sayed saw, that a man entēding to auoyde the smoke, falleth into the fyre. So here, the quene myndyng to preserue her husbad in honour, & herselfe in authorite procured & consented to the death of this nobleman, [the D of Glocester] whose onely deathe brought to passe that thynge, which she wolde most fayne haue eschewed, and toke from her that iewell, whiche she moste desired.
Hall. Hen. VI. an. 25.

Socrates,—nat only by the aunswere of Apollo, but also by the consente of all excellente writers that folowed hym, and the vniuersall renoume of all people, was approued to be the wyseste man of all Grece.
Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. iii. c. 21.

But whosoeuer was the manqueller of this holy man, it shall appere, that both the murtherer, and the consenter, had condigne and not vndeserved punishment, for their bloudye stroke, and butcherly act.—Hall. Edw. IV. an. 10.

The techeth he on the tother side yt whosoeuer after his baptisme had, & the story sayth, that is (sayth he) the fayth with which we beleue the articles of the fayth as men beleue a story or a cronicle, doe any deadly sin of purpose, that it is to wit as he sayth, not of weaknesse or frailty, but of malice or wyllingly with a consenting to yt sinne that a man shall neuer after be forgiuen in this worlde nor in none other.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 542.

For he sayde that nouther he nor all the lordes that were there of Englande coulde nat conclude fermely on no peace, without the generall consentment of the people of England.
Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. ii. c. 213.

And as reason is essential unto law; so likewise unto human lawes, common consent.
Grew. Cosmo. Sacra, b. iii. c. 6.

When the wills of many concur to one and the same action and effect; this concourse of their wills is called consent, by which we must not understand one will of many men (for every man hath his several will) but many wills to the producing of one effect.—Hobbs. Human Nature, c. 12.

I say again, that he who denies there are such spirits, shews that he himselfe hath a spirit of contradiction in him, opposing the current and consentient opinion of all ant quity.
Howell, b. iii. Let. 23.

But if by concupiscence, we mean the second acts of it, that is, avoidable consentings, and deliberate elections, then let it be as much condemned as the apostle and all the church after him hath sentenced it; but then it is not Adam's sin, but our own by which we are condemned; for it is not his fault that we chuse.
Bp. Taylor. Answer to a Letter concerning Original Sin.

They doing it [making a contract] without witnesses, may recede from it, either consentingly, or against the will of one of them.—Id. Rule of Conscience, b. ii. c. 1.

Moreover, in coupling women by way of matrimony, it would be a good law, and consentaneous to reason, if out of all dowrests exceeding £100. there should be two out of every cent. deducted and put into a common treasury for the putting off hard favour'd and poor maids.
Howell, b. iv. Let. 7.

Whereof Thales being the head, he is consentaneously thereunto by Aristotle, made to be αρχηγος της τοιαυτης φιλοσοφιας, the prince and leader of this kind of atheistical philosophy, he deriving all things whatsoever, as Homer had done before him, from water, and acknowledging no other principle but the fluid matter.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, p. 123.

There may be a simple internal energy or vital autokinesie, which is without that duplication, that is included in the nature of συναισθησις, con-sense and consciousness, which makes a being to be present with itself, attentive to its own actions, or animadversive of them, to perceive itself, to do or suffer, and to have a fruition or enjoyment of it self.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, p. 159.

A great number of such living and thinking particles could not possibly by their mutual contact and pressing and striking compose one greater individual animal, with one mind and understanding, and a vital consension of the whole body: any more than a swarm of bees, or a crowd of men and women can be conceived to make up one particular living creature compounded and constituted of the aggregate of them all.—Bentley, Ser. 2.

He was asked, why he did contrary to the king's authority within his kingdom, dissuade many, that they should not consent to the opinion of the king and parliament.
Strype. Memorials. Hen. VIII. an. 1536.

Now I do affirm the consentient and constant doctrine of the primitive church to be this;—that the souls of all the faithful, immediately after death, enter into a place and state of bliss, far exceeding all the felicities of this world, though short of that most consummate perfect beatitude of the kingdom of heaven, with which they are to be crowned and rewarded in the resurrection: and so on the contrary, that the souls of all the wicked are presently after death in a state of very great misery, and yet dreading a far greater misery at the day of judgment.—Bp. Bull, vol. i. Ser. 3.

It is by means of this communication of the nerves, that whatever affects the soul, is demonstrated (whether we will or no) by a consentaneous disposition of the præcordia within, and a suitable configuration of the muscles and parts of the face without.—Derham. Physico-Theology, b. v. c. 8.

But if Paracelsus did always write so consentaneously to himself, that his opinion were confidently to be collected from every place of his writings, where he seems to express it, I might, &c.—Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 542.

To reconcile this, the ancient Christian writers generally agree, that their consent ought not to be slighted.
Jortin. On the Christian Religion, Dis. i.

It follows from what has been said, that such as cannot honestly assent to this formulary, must (if they aspire to be public teachers of religion) unite themselves with some other consentient church.

CO'NSEQUENTNESS.

Fr. Conséquence; It. Consequenza; Sp. Consequencia; Lat. Consequi, pres. part. consequens, following with. See CONSECUTE.

That which follows, comes next in order, in succession, in connexion; (met.) the event, the effect, the result; the inference, the deduction.

It is also applied emphatically; as a matter of consequence; i. e. of great, serious, important consequence. And thus, consequential, (in Fr. Conséquentieux,) as applied to any person; thinking, conceiting himself to be of great, serious, important, consequence.

Men shall thinke it a good consequent.
Frith. Workes, p. 68.

These were the allyes and consequentes, and also the preparations of the one partye, and of the other.
Nicoll. Thucydides, fol. 49.

Whether it suffer not detriment, by attributing lesse then of right belongeth; the iudgement be theirs, that vprightly and indifferently shall weigh the consequences of their euil purpose, who in seeking to detract from the author of these discoueries, doe so much as in them lieth, wound, deface, and tread vnder foot the thing itselfe.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. iii. p. 666.

And consequently, to say that the Pope cā deliuer any soule out of purgatory, (if there were but one) is but a vaine lie, except he can proue that he goeth down vnto them, and preacheth vnto them the woorde of God, (which is the salt that must season them, and key that must let them out) for other loosing there is none.—Frith. Workes, p. 59.

Phil. Likewise of consequencie, you (master doctor) must needs denie, which you haue said, that these wordes, This is my body, being only spoken, be sufficient to make the body and bloud of Christ in the sacrament, as you haue vntruely said.—Foxe. Martyrs. Sixth Exam. of J. Philpot.

There are disputes in Christendome concerning matters of greater concernment, then most of those opinions that distinguish sects and make factions; and yet because men are permitted to differ in those great matters, such evils are not consequent to such differences, as are to the uncharitable managing of smaller and more inconsiderable questions.
Bp. Taylor. Liberty of Prophesying, Introd.

When a man hath so often observed like antecedents to be followed by like consequents, that whensoever he seeth the antecedent, he looketh again for the consequent: or when he seeth the consequent, maketh account there hath been the like antecedent, then he calleth both the antecedent and the consequent, signs one of another, as clouds are signs of rain to come and rain of clouds past.
Hobbs. Human Nature, c. 4.

But if they demand it, they are not to be denied, only let the minister in general represent the evil consequents of an unworthy participation.—Bp. Taylor. Holy Dying, s. 4.

There are, indeed, such consequences as are plainly necessary, and those which in their first sight carry in them no lesse certainty, then the principles from which they were immediately derived. Of this nature are they which are reciprocally deduced from their certain and intrinsicall causes to their effects.—Bp. Hall. Christian Moderation, b. ii. s. 11.

Moses, as if fore-seeing the miserable work that man's ignorance and pusillanimity would make in this matrimonious business, and endeavouring his utmost to prevent it, condescends in this place to such a methodical and school-like way of defining and consequencing as in no place of the whole law more. Gen. ii. 24.—Milton. Tetrachordon.

Which doctrine savoureth very strongly of anabaptisme, and doth deprive those of the effectes and fruites of the sacramentes, which haue been partakers of them without the worde preached when they were ministred, and so consequently euen yourselfe, for it is not like that there was a sermon at your christening.—Whitgift. Defence, p. 366.

Let them draw the entire thrid through their fingers, and examine the consequentness of the whole body of the doctrine I deliver.—Digby. Of Bodies, Ded. B.

For Gildas tells us the decay of it [British nation] began by civil wars among themselves, and high discontents remaining as the consequents of them.—Stillingfleet, vol. i. 8.1.

I think them [the papists] the less dangerous, at least in appearance, to our present state; for not only the penal laws are in force against them, and their number is contemptible; but also their peers and commons are excluded from parliament, and consequently those laws in no probability of being repealed.—Dryden. Religio Laici, Pref.

All that is revealed in Scripture has a consequential necessity of being believed by all those, to whom it is proposed; because it is of Divine authority, one part as much as another.—Locke. Second Vind. of the Reas. of Christianity.

No body writes a book without meaning something, though he may not have the faculty of writing consequentially, and expressing his meaning.—Addison. Whig Examiner, No. 4.

Wherefore they who affirm, that to serve God in hope of the reward which he hath promised, is a slavish and sinful obedience, do consequentially, cast a very foul slur upon all those eminent patterns and examples of virtue, which the Holy Ghost here sets forth and propounds to our imitation.
Bp. Bull, vol. i. Ser. 14.

The estimation in which we stand in respect to our neighbours, will be in proportion to the degree in which we excel or are inferior to them in the acquisition of intellectual excellence, of which trade and its consequential riches must be acknowledged to give the means.—Sir J. Reynolds, Dis. 9.

Can you then assume any more evident principle, from which the truth of these axioms [that a whole is greater than a part] may be consequentially inferred?
Beattie. On Truth, pt. i. c. 2. s. 1.

Unto his recreation.—Gower. Con. A. b. vi.

Our generall vsed him singularly well, banqueted him most royally with the choyce of many and sundry conserves, wines both sweete and other, and caused his musicians to make him musike.—Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. iii. p. 821.

It remaineth therefore, that as your lordship from time to time under her most gracious and excellent maiestie, haue shewed yourself a valient protectour, a careful conseruer, and an happy enlarger of the honour and reputation of your country; so at length you may enioy those celestial blessings, which are prepared for such as tread your steps, and seeke to aspire to such divine and heroical virtues.
Id. Ib. Ep. Ded.

A certain heathen man could vse this saying, that it was a miserable thing to forsake & betray the causes why we live for ye conservation of life.
Calvine. Foure Godlie Sermons, Ser. 2.

Vpō this became he, not only hys chief coūsailour, but also the high bishop of his soule, and conseruatour of his body, the preseruation of hys whole health & life to him committed, onely.—Bale. Image, pt. ii.

The schools say, heavy bodies fall downwards, out of an appetite to rest, and to conserve their nature in that place which is most proper for them; ascribing appetite, and knowledge of what is good for their conservation (which is more than man has) to things inanimate, absurdly.
Hobbs. Leviathan, c. 3.

They'll fetch you conserve from the hip
And lay it softly on your lip,
Through their nibbling bills they'l chirup
And fluttering feed you with the sirup.
Drayton, Nymphal 2.

But good conservative is no other than the reception and fruition of things agreeable to our nature; and this good, though it bee most simple and native; yet it seemes to be of all other kinds of good, the softest and lowest.
Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, b. vii. c. 2.

The Holy Spirit is the great conservative of the new life; only keep the keeper, take care that the spirit of God do not depart from you.—Bp. Taylor. Of Confirmation.

By how much they should be more intent than others, upon the fair dispensation of law and liberty (as such who were not the conservators and assertors of their own liberty onely, but of the rest of the Grecians) by so much ought they more diligently to observe and provide, to their uttermost endeavours, for themselves against them, whose mind and counsels were contrarily inclined.
Usher. Annals, an. 3833.

Adam's sin was punished by an expulsion out of Paradise, in which was a tree appointed to be the cure of diseases, and a conservatory of life.
Bp. Taylor. On Repentance, c. 6. s. 1.

For the amity which, on their parts, as they sent them word, they meant to conserve and maintain with the emperor.—Strype. Memorials. Q. Mary I. an. 1553.

So, my life, from this moment, I shall read all the learned cooks who have ever writ, study broths, plaisters, and conserves, till from a fine lady I become a notable woman.
Tatler, No. 53.

If we take the angel of the waters to be the guardian or conserver of them, perhaps as the Romans (in whose empire St. John wrote) had special officers to look to their aqueducts and other waters; it may not be amiss to observe upon the by, that he is introduced praising his and his fellow-spirits' great Creator.—Boyle. Works, vol. v. p. 173.

The papacy, as it hath been usurped in our native country, was either the procreant or conservant cause, or both procreant and conservant, of all the ecclesiastical controversies in the Christian world.
Fuller. Moderation of the Church of England, p. 493.

There is another thing that doth farther demonstrate the superintendence of the great Creator and conservator of the world; and that is, that things of great and absolutely necessary use, have soon and easily occurred to the invention of man; but things of little use, or very dangerous use, are rarely and slowly discovered, or still utterly undiscovered.—Derham. Physico-Theology, b. v. c. 1.

How safe and agreeable a conservatory the earth is to vegetables more than any other, is manifest from their rooting, drying, or being rendered infecund in the waters, or the air; but in the earth their vigour is long preserved.
Id. Ib. b. x. Note 11.

All your sophisters cannot produce any thing better adapted to preserve a rational and manly freedom than the course that we have pursued, who have chosen our nature rather than our speculations, our breasts rather than our inventions, for the great conservatories and magazines of our rights and privileges.—*Burke. Sith that in change her choise doth chief consist
The hauke may check, that now comes faire to fist.
Vncertaine Auctore. To his Loue hauing forsaken Him.

For an answer understand, right honorable, that winter here mentioned consisteth not in cold weather, short days, and long nights, but in cold zeal and affection, and in short devotion towards God, and in cold love and charity towards our neighbours.
Strype, No. 81. A Sermon at the Funeral of Q. Mary.

——— Tho' the use
Of such set entertainments more consists
In custom, than in course; yet reverend sir,
I am still made your servant by your presence.
Ford. 'Tis Pity She's a Whore, Act v. sc. 6.

——— Nigh founder'd on he fares,
Treading the crude consistence, half on foot,
Half flying. Milton. Paradise Lost, b. ii.

We are as water, weak, and of no consistence, always descending, abiding in no certain place, unless we are detained with violence; and every little breath of wind makes us rough and tempestuous, and troubles our faces.
Bp. Taylor, vol. iii. Ser. 8.

Thus also in practical philosophy there be some præambulæ operationis, some common precepts which must be instilled into us, to work a consistency in our tempers, firm enough for the undertaking and performing all moral tasks.
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p 618.

Though constant and consistent now it be,
Yet, when kind beams appear,
It melts, and glides apace into the sea
And loses itself there. Cowley. Coldness.

If the union of the parts consist only in rest; it would seem that a bagg of dust would be of as firm a consistence as that of marble or adamant.—Glanvill. Van. of Dog. c. 5.

The one inward in our minds, which is that we properly call repentance, (μετανοια,) and that consists in such a sense of our sins, and hatred of them, as makes us heartily sorrow for them and resolve to commit them no more. And the other is outward, and shews itself in our lives, and that consists in the actual forsaking those sins which we so resolved against.—Sharp. vol. iii. Ser. 8.

I shall handle them in their due extent, by shewing that no one kind of true peace is consistent with any sort of prevailing wickedness; whether by peace we mean the peace a man hath with himself in the tranquility of his mind; or the peace which men have in society with one another.
Stillingfleet, vol. i. Ser. 10.

To fancy that God originally created a certain quantity of matter and motion, and left them to frame a world at adventures, without any determinate and particular view, design or direction; this can no way be defended consistently, but must of necessity recur to downright Atheism.
Clarke. On Natural and Revealed Religion.

I am coming to consider the most material point you mentioned, when you recommended, in so high a tone, the consistency of popery, with the civil and religious liberties of this nation, from the temper and example of the archbishop of Cambray.
Hoadly. Letters signed Britannicus, Let. 64.

From all this it appears, that their defection from the God of Israel, wicked and abominable as it was, did not however consist in the rejecting him as a false God, or in renouncing the law of Moses as a false religion; but only, in joining foreign worship and idolatrous ceremonies to the ritual of the true God.
Warburton. The Divine Legation, b. v. s. 2.

And what sure mark distinguishes the wise?
Consistent wisdom ever wills the same;
Thy fickle wish is ever on the wing.
Young. The Complaint, Night 8.

I found it next to impracticable, to deliver short, unadorned, didactical sentences, consistently with the copiousness, irregularity, and enthusiasm peculiar to ode-writing.
Hart. Thomas a Kempis. To the Reader.

——— At early day,
Sweet slumber shaken from her opening lids,
My lovely Patty to her dairy hies.
There from the surface of expanded bowls
She skims the floating cream, and to her churn
Commits the rich consistence.—Dodsley. Agriculture, c. 3.

[They come] from one who wishes to preserve consistency; but who would preserve consistency by varying his means to secure the unity of his end.
Burke. Reflections on the French Revolution.

And so befell, sone after on a day
This false judge, as telleth us the storie,
As he was wont, sat in his consistorie
And yaf his domes upon sondry cas.
Chaucer. The Doctoures Tale, v. 12,095.

And [I denounce and show for accursed] al those that let prelates or ordynaries for to holde consystory sessyon, or chapytres, for to enquyre of synnes, and of excesse, in good amendment of mannes soul.
Strype. Memorials. The general Sentence, or Curse.

Paul the Fourth was sworn at his election to the papacy to make but four cardinalls, which oath he presently broke, in open consistory maintaining it is an article of faith, that the pope cannot be bound, much lesse can bind himself.
Feltham. On the Low Countries, pt. ii.

Answere was returned from the said churches, That they had heard alreadie of those consistoriall lawes, and did acknowledge them to be Godly ordinances, drawing towards the prescript of the Word of God.
Hooker. Ecclesiasticall Politie, Pref.

You fall next on the consistorian schismaticks; for so you call Presbyterians, pag. 40, and judge them to have enervated the king's supremacy by their opinions and practise, differing in many things only in terms from popery.
Milton. Brief Notes on Dr. Griffith's Sermon.

For all the treasure and other princely ensigns and imperiall ornaments, together with the præfect and the consistorians, were inclosed within the compass of the wals.
Holland. Ammianus, p. 422.

He knew, when he told you this story, that he did not appeal from the sentence given in the court in Jersey, to any consistorial court of the bishop of Winchester.

I am yet willing to grant, that generally in nature the best outward shapes are also the likeliest to be consociated with good inward faculties.—Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 79.

If that gracious hand will exempt us from the common judgment of our consorts in evil, we have cause to bless his mercy; but if his just hand shall sweep us away in the company of our wicked consociates, we have reason to thank none but ourselves for our sufferings.
Bp. Hall. Select Thoughts.

It [a duel] is a consociation of many the worst acts that a person ordinarily can be guilty of: it is want of charity, of justice, of humility, of trust in God's providence.
Bp. Taylor. Great Exemplar, pt. ii. Dis. 11.

Because the soul joyned to the body draws from the society of the flesh incentives and arguments to sin; therefore both of them are punished, as being guilty of consociation.
Id. On Repentance, c. 7. s. 1.

He will rather conclude that those few that should happen to clash, might rebound after the collision; or if they cohered, yet by the next conflict with other atoms might be separated again, and so on in an eternal vicissitude of fast and loose, without ever consociating into the huge condense bodies of planets.—Bentley, Ser. 7.

The 3d relates to a man, as he is a being integrated by a human mind and living body, strictly associated by certain laws of union or consociation established by God in this monadical creature.—Boyle. Works, vol. vi. p. 731.

With every wind to waft large commerce on,
Join pole to pole, consociate sever'd worlds
And link in bonds of intercourse and love
Earth's universal family.—Mallet. Amyntor & Theodora.

Thus Epictetus, a thorough Stoic, if ever there was any, speaking of death says, But whither do you go? no where to your hurt: you return from whence you came, to a friendly consociation with your kindred elements.
Warburton. The Divine Legation, b. iii. s. 2.

Thynkest thou it a small thynge of the consolacions of God? and are they wyth thee a lyinge worde.
Bible, 1551. Job, c. 15.

And in yeldynge graces to oure moste consolatrice, that moste blessyd virgyn our lady saynt Mary: ye virgyne, here I agayne salute with thee seconde of the foresay'd vii. joyes.
Fabyan, c. 49.

He also commaunded his glorious apostles to preach it, and confirmed it with so many myracles, and did also geeue to the confirming and writing of it, the glorious consolatour of the Holy Ghost.—Barnes. Workes, p. 293.

Wherin he reporteth of the coragious
Wordes, that were moche consolatory
By Eschines rehersed, to the great glory
Of Demosthenes, that was his utter fo,
Fewe shall ye fynde or none that will do so.
Skelton. The Crowne of Laurell.

——— I will begone,
That pittifull rumour may report my flight
To consolate thine ear.—Shakesp. All's Well, Act iii. sc. 2.

Consolatories writ
With studied argument, and much perswasion sought
Lenient of grief and anxious thought:
But to th' afflicted in his pangs their sound
Little prevails, or rather seems a tune
Harsh, and of dissonant mood from his complaint;
Unless he feel within
Some source of consolation from above.
Milton. Samson Agonistes.

Fortune forotun'd the dying notes of Rome,
Till I, thy consul sole, consol'd thy doom.
Dryden. Juvenal, s. 10.

But, what may somewhat consolate all men that honour vertue, we do not discover the latter scene of his [Belisarius] misery in authors of antiquity, or such as have expressly delivered the story of those times.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. vii. c. 17.

This excellent young woman has nothing to consolate herself with but the reflection that her sufferings are not the effect of any guilt or misconduct, and has for her protection the influence of a power which, amidst the unjust reproach of all mankind, can give not only patience, but pleasure to innocence in distress.—Tatler, No. 199.

But that what we ask in the name of Jesus Christ, he will do it, we have his own word; and that to, not only once, but again, that we might have strong consolation, and be the more fully assured of it.—Bp. Beveridge, vol. i. Ser. 31.

My present employment is the reviewing some consolatory thoughts on the loss of friends, which my poor Lady Susan's death obliged me to entertain myself with, and which I am now recruiting.—Boyle. Works, vol. vi. p. 48.

Mr. Pope retired with some chagrin to Twickenham, but consoled himself and his friend with this sarcastic reflexion —"We shall take our degree together in fame, whatever we do at the university."—Warburton. Life, by Hurd.

In this season, therefore, of dejection, occasioned by the indisposition of my wife, the dangerous sickness of some of my servants, and the death of others, I have recourse to my books, as to the sovereign consolers of my sorrows.
Melmoth. Pliny, b. viii. Let. 19.

However, it affords me a very sensible consolation, that there is strong reason to hope the prudence of your friends will be able to elude the force of those iniquitous schemes which have been projected to your prejudice.
Id. Cicero, b. i. Let. 19.

The punishment of real tyrants is a noble and awful act of justice: and it has with truth been said to be consolatory to the human mind.—Burke. On the French Revolution.

CONSO'LIDATE, v. CONSO'LIDATE, adj. CONSOLIDA'TION. } Fr. Consolider; Sp. Consolidar; It. Consolidare; Lat. Consolidare, to fix into one whole, one mass, (con, and solidus. See SOLID.)

In so moche that it seemeth, that no operation or affairs may be perfecte, nor no science or arte complete, except experience be there vnto added, wherby knowledge is ratyfied, and (as I mought saye) consolidate.
Sir T. Elyot. Governor, b. iii. c. 25.

Consyderynge the vtilitie in rydynge great horses, it shall be necessary (as I haue sayde) that a gentylman do lerne to ryde a great and fierce horse whyles he is tender, and the braunes and sinewes of his thighes not fully consolidate.
Id. Ib. b. i. c. 17.

Sometimes, they find the mines not yet consolidated and digested throughly into metal; when, by their experience knowing after how many years they will be ripe, they shut them up again till then.—Digby. Of Bodies, c. 14.

Take a wanton garish loose spirit, let him be but in the presence of a superior whom he fears and reverenceth, and it consolidates him.—Goodwin. Vanity of Thoughts, p. 46.

We are divided between good and evil; and all our good or bad is but a disposition towards either, but then the sin is arrived to its state and manhood, when the joynts are grown stiff and firm by the consolidation of a habit.
Bp. Taylor. On Repentance, c. 5. s. 3.

And yet when that was done, would he be far enough from making the extension of body (which is the cohesion of its solid parts) intelligible, till he could shew wherein consisted the union or consolidation of the part of those bonds or of that cement, or of the least particle of matter that exists.—Locke. On Hum. Underst. b. ii. c. 23.

The last thing considered by the board of controul among the debts of the Carnatick, was that arising to the East-India Company, which after the provision for the cavalry, and the consolidation of 1777, was to divide the residue of the fund of 480,000*l.* a year with the lenders of 1767.
Burke. Speech on the Nabob of Arcot's Debts.

Sounding together, sounding in unison, uniting in sound, symphonious, harmonious, concordant; and thus, agreeing, consisting with.

For in ye Scriptures is no cõfuse ordre, but a cõfourme & consonant ordre, one chaptre alwais approuyng & declaryngc an other.—Bale. Apologie, fol. 55.

Yet I think that confession is not necessarily deduced of Scripture, nor commanded as a necessary prescript of Scripture, and yet it is much consonant to the law of God, as a thing willed, not commanded.—Burnet. Records, b. iii. No. 21. Concerning the Sacraments, Quest. 15.

For wheras all ye olde holy doctours & saintes of euery age, write so full & so whole, & so consonantly togither against al kindes of scismes & heresies, &c.
Sir T. More. Workes, p. 829.

The British language, which our vowels wants,
And jars so much upon harsh consonants,
Comes with such grace from thy melnfluous tongue,
As do the sweet notes of a well set song.
Drayton. Queen Catherine to Owen Tudor.

As in every thing else, beauty and favour is composed and framed (as it were) of many members meeting and concurring in one, and all together at the same time, and that by a certaine simmetry, consonance, and harmony.
Holland. Plutarch, p. 50.

Which could we suppose in a single instance: yet a multitude of musical consonancies would be as impossible, as to play a thousand tunes upon a lute at once.
Glanvil. The Vanity of Dogmatizing, c. 4.

If I may have leave to do consonantly to what I am taught to believe, I must confess myself to be under the dominion of sin, and therefore must obey.
Bp. Taylor. On Repentance, Pref.

Give me leave to present you [Lord Carbery] with her [Lady Carbery's] picture, drawn in little and in water-colours, suited indeed with tears, and the abrupt accents of a real and consonant sorrow.—Id. Funeral Sermon. (Lady Carbery)

They all plead Scripture for what they say; and each one pretends, that his opinion, be it ever so absurd and ridiculous, is consonant to the words there used.
Bp. Beveridge, vol. i. Ser. 6.

Those letters are styled consonants, in the pronouncing of which the breath is intercepted by some collision or closure, amongst the instruments of speech.
Wilkins. On a Real Character, pt. iii. c. 12.

Soft sigh'd the flute; the tender voice was heard,
Warbling the varied heart; the woodlands round
Apply'd their quire, and winds and waters flow'd
In consonance.
Thomson. Spring.

Sin discomposeth all the consonancy in man, making a discord between flesh and blood, which is the cause of all evil, and finally of the last of all dissonancies, which is death.
Tatler, No. 274.

And therefore I shall rather observe, that consonantly thereunto God was pleased to consider man, so much the more than the creatures made for him, that he made the sun itself stand still, and at another time to go back, and divers times made part of the universe forget their nature, or act contrary to it.—Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 17.

This severe vengeance on enormous offenders was believed, not only consonant to the rules of human, but to be the object, and to make the especial care of the Divine justice.—Hurd. Notes on the Art of Poetry.

His stanzas are too long, especially his epodes; the ode is finished before the ear has learned its measures, and consequently before it can receive pleasure from their consonance and recurrence.—Johnson. Life of Gray.

Though these consonancies chyming in the writer's head, he might not always be aware of the imitation.

For we see such miseries, hange ouer the whole state of common wealth, through the great misorder of your sedicion, that it maketh vs much to reioyce that we haue bene neither parteners of your doings nor conspirers of your counsayles.
Sir J. Cheke. Hurt of Sedition.

But as soon as it was day, certaine Jewes made a conspiracion, and cursed themselues to the deuyll and to damnacion yf they did eyther eate or drynke, before they had slayne Paule.—Udal. Actes, c. 23.

And finally those of the people were strongest at the gates, so that they wold not suffre them to be openedde. In such sorte, that the conspyratours could not execute their trahisone.—Ascoll. Thucydides, fol. 111.

But the serpent Idre of enuy and false conspyracy, whiche euer burned in the harte of Edricus, was kyndeled so sore, that of pure force it must breke out vpon a lyght flambe.
Fabyan, vol. I. c. 204.

It hath bene the vsuall practise of all sectaries and especiallie Anabaptists, who count them all as wicked, and vngodlie, as vvorldlinges, and men pleasers, as idle and slouthfull, that conspire not vvith them in their confused platforme.
Whitgift. Defence, Pref. p. 5.

Stand ye secure ye safer shrubs below,
In humble dales, whom heav'ns do not dispight;
Nor angry clouds conspire your overthrow
Envying at your too disdainful height.
Bp. Hall. Satires. A Defiance to Envy.

He fell againe into another newe trouble and daunger; being called into question as one of Catalines conspiracie, both before the questor Novivs Niger in his house, and that by L. Conspirant 'gainst this high illustrious prince.
Shakespeare. Lear, Act v. sc. 3.

Twere now time to reduce this operation to practice, and shew you, 1. What directions conscience is able to afford from every of those laws for the ruling of all actions of that kind: and secondly, what an harmony and conspiration there is betwixt all these laws, one mutually aiding and assisting the other, and not violating and destroying.
Hammond. Works, vol. i. p. 210.

But these conspirers couched all so clene
Through close demeanour, that their wiles did weane
My heart from doubts, so many a false deuice
They forged fresh, to hide their enterprise.
Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 406.

Whosoever shall put away, either violently without mutual consent for urgent reasons, or conspiringly by plot of lust, or cunning malice, shall put away for any sudden mood, or contingency of disagreement, which is not daily practice but may blow soon over, and be reconcil'd, except it be fornication; that man, or that pair, commit adultery.
Milton. Tetrachordon.

Roaring she tears the air with such a noise
As well resembled the conspiring voice
Of routed armies, when the field is won;
To reach the ears of her escaped son.
Waller. Battle of the Summer Islands, c. 3.

I know thou'lt say, my passion's out of season,
That Cato's great example and misfortunes
Should both conspire to drive it from my thoughts.
Addison. Cato, Act iii. sc. 1.

That those three [the Holy Spirit, the Father, and Son] joyned and confederated (as it were) are conspiringly propitious and favourable to us.—Barrow, vol. ii. Ser. 34.

Then shalt thou find, whilst friends with foes conspire
To give more proof than virtue would desire,
Thy danger chiefly lies in acting well;
No crime's so great as daring to excel.
Churchill. Epistle to W. Hogarth.

Is it alien to the office of a good member of parliament, when such practises increase and when the audacity of the conspirators grows with their impunity, to point out in his place their evil tendency to the happy constitution which he is chosen to guard?
Burke. Appeal from the New to the Old Whigs.

I shall here, with the utmost veracity, give a short account of Catiline's conspiracy: a memorable attempt, both for the enormous wickedness of it, and the danger it threatened.
Rose. Sallust. The Conspiracy of Catiline.

CONSPISSA'TION. Lat. Conspissare, (con, and spissare, to thicken;) spissus, a σπιδνος, quod est densus, obscurus.

Denseness, thickness.

For body's but this spirit, fixt, gross by conspissation.
More. Infinity of Worlds, s. 13.

CO'NSTABLE, n. } Fr. Connétable; It. Conestabile; Sp. Condestable. Verstegan and Sir T. Smith think that this word might more rightly be kingstable, (King in A. S. Cuning.) Columen regis, the support or stay of the king. (See the quotation from Sir T. Smith.) Spelman, Menage, Du Cange, Vossius, and Skinner, agree that it is a corruption of comes stabuli, "an officer," as Blackstone observes, "well known in the empire; so called, because like the Lord High Constable of England, he was to regulate all matters of chivalry, tilts, tournaments, and feats of arms, which were performed on horseback," (Com. i. 355.)

And telle hire constance, and hire besinesse.
Chaucer. The Clerkes Tale, v. 3884.

And last of all he was called before the bishoppes in a common assemblye at London, where he so constantly defended himselfe that he had preuailed, if he might haue bene heard, as indeed he was not.—Frith. Workes. Life, p. 3.

The fire it cannot frese,
For it is not his kinde;
Nor true love cannot lese
The constance of the minde.
Surrey. The Louer excuseth Himself, &c.

These things we [Saxony and Hesse] now repeat, that a testimony might remain with the king, signed by us: that he might not doubt of our constancy.
Strype. Records, No. 103. To the King.

And all these before named albeit they haue not yet obteyned the rewarde promised them for their godly lyuynge, whiche reward shal be geuen them at the general resurrection of the bodyes: yet haue they deserued perpetuall prayse for the constantnesse of theyr fayth.—Udal. Heb. c. 11.

The ancient churches in the time of the first persecutions, cannot shewe a more famous, whether wee doe behold the force of his faith, his firme and stedfast constantnesse, the inuincible strength of his spirit, or the cruel and horrible tormentes.—Fox. Martyrs. W. Gardiner, p. 1211.

But, like a constant and confirmed devil,
He entertain'd a show so seeming just,
And therein so ensconc'd his secret evil,
That jealousy itself could not mistrust.
Shakespeare. Rape of Lucrece.

Drayton. To Mr. W. Brown.

Proud of her birth (for equal she had none)
The rest she scorn'd, but hated him alone;
His gifts, his constant courtship, nothing gain'd;
For she, the more he lov'd, the more disdain'd.
Dryden. Theodore & Honoria.

Thus the wise nightingale, that leaves her home,
Her native wood, when storms and winter come,
Pursuing constantly the cheerful spring,
To foreign groves does her old music bring
Waller. To Sir W. D'Avenant.

Why have not I this constancy of mind,
Who have so many griefs to try its force.
Addison. Cato, Act i. sc. 3.

Honourable indeed is that approbation which is bestowed by those who have themselves been the constant object of universal applause.—Melmoth. Cicero, b. vi. Let. 10.

Let temp'rance constantly preside
Our best physician, friend, and guide!
Cotton. Health, Vision 3

This Divine favour was not confined to the three first centuries: it hath been extended to multitudes, who since that time have fallen innocent victims to Antichristian tyranny, and have laid down their lives for their religion with as much constancy as the ancient Christians.
Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History.

CONSTE'LLATE, v. } Fr. Constellation; It. Constellazione; Sp. Constellacion; the Lat. Constellatus and constellatio, (con, and stella, a star,) are not of classical authority. Constellatio is used by Ammianus. (See the quotation from Holland's translation.) Constellatus, by Trebellius Pollio. A constellation is—
CONSTRELLA'TION.

An assembly or collection of many stars; of the light, of the brilliancy of many stars; of light and brilliancy.

To be bore othr bygete, in suche constellacion.
Piers Ploughman, p. 230.

Som wikke aspect or disposition
Of Saturne, by som constellation,
Hath yeven us this.—Chaucer. The Knightes Tale, v. 1090.

And nethles yet some men write
And sayn fortune is to wite:
And some men holde opinion,
That it is constellacion,
Whiche causeth all that a man doothe
Gower. Con A Prol

He cursed his fate or constellation, and wished that he had never comen to Athenes.
Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. ii. c. 12

So these scattered perfections which are divided among the several cantons of created beings, were, as it were, constellated and summ'd up in this epitome of the greater world, Man.—Glanvill. Vanity of Dogmatizing, c. 1.

What artist now dares boast that he can bring
Heav'n hither, or constellate any thing,
So as the influence of those stars may be
Imprison'd in a herb, or charm, or tree,
And do by touch all which those stars could do?
Donne. An Anatomy of the World.

Up, up, fair bride, and call
Thy stars from out their several boxes, take Thy rubies, pearls, and diamonds forth and make Thyself a constellation of them all.—Id. Epithalamium.

Among the papers, there was found the horoscope of one Fulens, and when he was charged often thus farre, namely why he had calculated the constellation of the prince [Valens], he promised to shew by good and evident proofes, that it was his own brother Valens.—Holland. Ammianus, p 362

And you will not much wonder, that I place this virtue among those that constellate, if I may so speak, an heroic mind.—Boyle. Works, vol. v. p. 561.

There is extant in the scripture, to them who know how to constellate those lights, a very excellent body of moral precepts.—Id. Ib. vol. ii. p. 285.

These are the single stars which are sprinkled through the Æneis; but there are whole constellations of them in the fifth book.—Dryden. Discourse on Epick Poetry.

He who is solicitous for his own improvement must not be limited by local reputation, but select from every tribe of mortals their characteristical virtues, and constellate in himself the scattered graces which shine single in other men.—Rambler, No. 201.

He [Locke] would have seen that the only composition was in the terms; and consequently, that it was as improper to speak of a complex idea, as it would be to call a constellation a complex star.—Tooke. Div. of Purley, pt. i. c. 2.

CONSTERNA'TION. Fr. Consternation; Lat. Consternare, of the same origin as Consternere. Sterno from storno, by syncope from στορεννυω, and that from στορεω; στορ-ειν, to throw or lay flat.

Consternation is applied to that dejection, that prostration, that inert helplessness of mind, which is caused by fear, by astonishment; to that stupor of the faculties, which is caused by surprise, amazement or wonder. And thus, to the fear itself, to astonishment, surprise, amazement, wonder.

When accidents like thieves, unthought on, set upon us; the consternation gives the deeper wound.—Feltham, pt. i. Res. 5.

This increased the consternation and belief in every body, that there was nothing but immediate death to be expected which made all endeavour, might and main, to escape away.
Strype. Memorials. Edw. VI. an. 1551.

We now thought all danger was over, but about an hour afterwards, just as the man in the chains had cried "seventeen fathom" the ship struck. The shock threw us all into the utmost consternation.—Cook. Voyage, vol. i. b. ii. c. 4.

Consternation: this species of fear is a strong forboding of tremendous evils, which are likely to follow misfortunes that have already taken place.—Cogan. On the Passions, c. 2. s. 3.

CO'NSTIPATE, v. } Lat. Constipare, atum,
CONSTIPA'TION. } (con, and stipare;) a στειβ-ειν, fortasse Græco verbo, (Varro, lib. iv.) Στειβ-ειν, calcare, to tread or trample upon: calcando comprimere, et condensare;

To compress, to condense, to thicken, to cram or squeeze close, to close or stop up.

It helpeth squynances, or quyncis in the throte, and dissolueth the constipations or stoppinges made of all places, if the places be scarified.—Sir T. Elyot. Castel of Helth, b. iii.

Hard and vehement friction doth constipat the body.
Holland. Plinie, b. xxviii. c. 4.

As Themison, and his old sect of methodists resolv'd, that the laxum and strictum, the immoderate dissolution or constipation were the principles and originals of all diseases in the world, so it will be likely to prove in our spiritual estate also.—Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 577.

And thus it is in the lowest and densest region of the air near the surface of the earth, where the whole mass of air is in a state of violent compression, the inferior being press'd and constipated by the weight of all the incumbent.
Bentley, Ser. 7.

The reason of which is manifest from what hath been said, viz. in spring, when the earth and waters are loosed from the brumal constipations, the vapours arise in great plenty.
Derham. Physico-Theology, b. i. c. 3. N. (a.)

CO'NSTITUTE, v. } Fr. Constituer; It. Costituire; Sp. Constituir; Lat. Constituere, utum; to put, place, or cause to be or stand together, (con, and statuere, from statum, past part. of stare, to stand,) To constitute, as applied in English, is—CO'NSTITUTE, n.

CONSTITU'TIONED.
CONSTITU'TIONAL.
CONSTITU'TIONALIST.
CONSTITU'TIONALLY.
CONSTITU'TIONIST.
CO'NSTITUTING, n.
CONSTITU'TIVE.
CONST'TUENT, n.

To cause or make to be, to fix, settle, establish or confirm; to ordain, decree, appoint or determine.

Skelton writes Constitue.

Constitution is applied to the whole state or condition of bodily strength or health; to that also of the mind; to the whole established state or condition of the laws.

The said noble Osrike, by councell of Boseli,
(Which was the first bishop of Worcester diocese)
Did put in here nuns, to enhabite and dwell,
And Kingburge his sister did constitute abbesse.
R. Gloucester, p. 579. App.

The grounde my sonne for to seche
Upon this diffinicion,
The worldes constitucion
Hath set the name of gentillnesse
Vpon the fortune of richesse.—Gower. Con. A. b. iv.

Wherefore I shall specyfye vnto you the condycyons of the envyous, who that hodeth hym of the subgectes of enuye, she constytueth to deuoure, and byte euery bodye.
Skelton. The Boke of Three Fooles.

Wherefore if men wil be wyse and warned in tyme, let them fere God constituting heithen kinges, as was Nebuchadnecer, and now is the Turke, to punisshe sinne.
Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, c. 1.

Than seas fayth is the foundation of justice, whiche is the chiefe constitutour and maker of a publyke weale and by the afore mencioned auctoritie, conseruatour of the same, I maye well conclude, that fayth is bothe the originall, and (as it were) principal constitutour and conseruatour of the publyke weale.—Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. iii. c. 7.

And yet were they themselues for blynde zeale of their owne constitutions, as redy as their fathers to slea whosoeuer testified vnto them, the same truth which, the prophets testified vnto their fathers.—Tyndall. Workes, p. 30.

This Brutus had three sonnes, who constituted three kingdoms.—Stow. Memorable Antiquities.

For enfranchised Latines, the freedome of Romane citizens, and for womē, the priviledge and benefit of those that had four children, which constitutions stand in force and be observed at this day.—Holland. Suetonius, p. 163.

But equity that beare an even rein
Upon the present courses, holds in awe
By giving hand a little, and doth gain
By a gentle relaxation of the law:
And yet inviolable doth maintain
The end whereto all constitutions drawe,
Which is the welfare of society,
Consisting of an upright policy.
Daniel. To Sir Thomas Egerton.

For the law and the covenant were the constitutive parts of that whole entercourse; they were the whole relation, and this is that which St. John said, The law came by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ.
Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. ii. c. 2.

For some things there are no certain measures, and there are very many constituent or intervening things and circumstances of things by which it is made impossible to give a certain judgment of the whole.
Id. On Repentance, c. 1. s. 2.

A man that will not obey the king's constitute.
Preston. Tragedy of Cambyses, (about 1561.)

That which constitutes the nature of man, and doth formally difference and distinguish him from all other animals, is, not so much the power of reason, as the capacity of being religious.—Sharp, vol. i. Ser. 15.

If this [the freedom and independency of parliament] be shaken, our constitution totters. If it be quite removed,—our constitution falls into ruin. That noble fabric, the pride of Britain, the envy of her neighbours, raised by the labour of so many centuries, repaired at the expense of so many millions, and cemented by such a profusion of blood; that noble fabric, I say, which was able to resist the united efforts of so many races of giants, may be demolished by a race of pigmies.—Bolingbroke. Dissertation upon Parties.

Besides, I would fain ask these tender-constitution'd ladies, why they should require more cooling than their mothers before them.—Spectator, No. 127.

Let us hope, and endeavour by all possible means, that it may not be felt too late; and to encourage the constitutionists, or the country-party, in this attempt, let us consider from whom an opposition to it is to be expected.
Bolingbroke. Dissertation upon Parties.

It is not more necessary to the constituting of a man that a human soul inhabit in a human body, than it is to the being a true Christian, that the Holy Spirit of God inhabit in the soul and body of the man.
Sharp. Works, vol. v. Dis. 3.

But not that the constitutive essences of all individual created beings were eternal and uncreated, as if God in creating of the world, did nothing else, but as some sarcastically express it, Sartoris instar Rerum Essentias vestire Existentia, only clothed the eternal, increated, and antecedent essences of things with a new outside garment of existence, and not created the whole of them.
Cudworth. Immutable Morality, b. iv. c. 6.

And for the more clear and regular proceeding on this copious subject, I shall distribute the globe into its own grand constituent parts.
1st, The earth and its appurtenances.
2d, The waters and theirs.
Derham. Physico-Theology, b. iii. Introd.

Men, who their duties know,
But know their rights, and knowing, dare maintain.
Prevent the long-aim'd blow,
And crush the tyrant while they rend the chain:
These constitute a state.—Jones. Ode in imit. of Alcæus.

If an honest, and I may truly affirm, a laborious zeal for the public service, has given me any weight in your esteem, let me exhort and conjure you, never to suffer an invasion of your political constitution, however minute the instance may appear, to pass by, without a determined, persevering resistance.—Junius, Ded.

Theories on government, when framed by sober and thinking men, cannot but be of great importance, as serving to remind both the governors and governed of their respective interests and duties; nay, and as tending ultimately to improve establishments themselves; but by degrees only, and by constitutional means.
Hurd. Sermon before the House of Lords.

Virgil only knew the horrour of the times before him. Had he lived to see the revolutionists and constitutionalists of France, he would have had more horrid and disgusting features of his Harpies to describe, and more frequent failures in the attempt to describe them.
Burke. To a Noble Lord.

Others may be more constitutionally dull hearted, and cannot raise their thoughts in so elevated a degree; and yet may still be pious Christians.—Gilpin, vol. i. Ser. 23.

If there is a doubt whether the house of commons represents perfectly the whole commons of Great Britain, (I think there is none,) there can be no question but that the lords and the commons together represent the sense of the whole people to the crown, and to the world. Thus it is when we speak legally and constitutionally.
Burke. On a Regicide Peace, Let. 3.

It was an artifice sometimes practised by the candidates for offices, in order to recommend themselves to the good graces of their constituents, to pretend a kindred to which they had no right, by assuming the name of some favourite and popular family.—Melmoth. Cicero, b. xii. Let. 10. Note.

CONSTRA'IN, v. } Fr. Constraindre; Sp. Constrénir; It. Costrignere; Lat. Constringere, to press close or tight together, (con, and stringere.)

CONSTRA'INTIVE, adj.

To press tight or close together; to compress; to draw together or contract; to bind together; to compel or force together; to compel, to force.

Constrain is formed immediately from the Fr. Constringe, Constrict (qqv.), from the Lat.

Men sholde constreyne no clerke to knavene werkes.
Piers Ploughman, p. 78.

And the lord seide to the seruant, go out into weyes and heggis: and constreyne men to entre: that myn hous be fulfild.—Wiclif. Luke, c. 14.

Fede ye the flok of God that is among you, purueie ye not as constreyned, but wilfulli bi God.—Id. 1 Petir, c. 5.

Women of kind desiren libertie,
And not to be constreined as a thral;
And so don men, if sothly I say shal.
Chaucer. The Frankeleines Tale, v. 11,081.

He was with loue vnwise constreigned,
And she with reason was restreigned.
Gower. Con. A. b. iv.

As ye will not doe of yourselves, ye must be compelled to do by others, and that ye refuse to doe willingly, thinke ye must be drawn to doe the same constrainedly.
Sir John Cheke. The Hurt of Sedition.

And that ye may well perceiue that his calling is no constraint of necessity, many whom he calleth, doe willingly for al his calling perish.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 1075.

[They haue] (not through any constraynyng necessitie or constraintiue vowe) but on a voluntarye choyce made their elder brothers mansion a colledge of single liuing.
Carew. Survey of Cornwall, fol. 127.

O! what strange things by deare experience past,
Could this man tell, amazement to constraine!
Who saw the world first full, then all turn'd waste
Yet liv'd himselfe to people it again.
Stirling. Doome-day. The eighth Houre.

O foule descent; that I who erst contended
With Gods to sit the highest, am now constrain'd
Into a beast, and mixt with bestial slime.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. ix.

What should he do? leane on the naked sand
This woefull ladie, half alive, halfe dead?
Kindnesse forbod, pittie did that withstand;
But hard constraint (alas) did thence him lead.
Fairefax. Godfrey of Boulogne, b. xvi. s. 61.

Cle. Yet there were some,
That in their sullen looks, rather confess'd
A forced constraint to serve her, than a will
To be at her devotion.
Massinger. The Emperor of the East, Act i. sc. 1.

For whereas men before stood bound in conscience to doe as the law of reason teacheth; they are now by vertue of humane law become constrainable, and if they outwardly transgresse, punishable.—Hooker. Eccles. Politie, b. i. § 10

As when sharp frosts had long constrain'd the earth,
A kindly thaw unlocks it with mild rain;
And first the tender blade peeps up to birth,
And straight the green fields laugh with promis'd grain.
Dryden. Annus Mirabilis, s. 284.

In this choice the age and inclination of the person is to be considered, and constraint always to be avoided in bringing him to it.—Locke. Of Education, s. 202.

Creon himself, unwilling quits the field,
Enrag'd, defeated, and constrayn'd to yield.
Wilkes. The Epigoniad, b. viii.

While some on earnest business bent
Their murmuring labours ply
'Gainst graver hours, that bring constraint,
To sweeten liberty.
Gray. Ode. On a distant Prospect of Eton College.

Medlars ar cold and dry costrictife or stratninge to the stomake, and therefore they may be eaten after meles as a medycine.—Sir T. Elyot. Castel of Helth, b. ii.

—— Not the dreadful spout,
Which shipmen doe the hurricano call,
Constring'd in masse by the Almighty Fenno, [sun?]
Shall dizzie with more clamour Neptune's ear
In his descent; then shall my prompted sword
Falling on Diomed.—Shakes. Troil. & Cress. Act iii. sc. 2.

But what we would intimate is only this, that their bodies being nothing but coagulated or constringed aire, when they (the devils) put them in such posture as to constringe their vehicles in a greater measure by far than agitate the single particles of it, that it will then seem not only cold as congealed water does, but more pierringly and stingingly cold, by reason of the subtilty of the parts.
More. App. to Antidote against Atheism, c. 13.

Tough or muscular fibres, intended not only to protect them, as hath hitherto been thought, but also by a due constriction to assist them, in straining of their several contents.—Grew. Cosmo. Sacra, b. i. c. 5.

Close crowds the shining atmosphere; and binds
Our strengthen'd bodies in its cold embrace,
Constringent.
Thomson. Winter.

Such things as constrict the fibres and strengthen the solid.—Arbuthnot. On Diet.

He was called to a lusty young woman, who, upon an accidental but violent cold, was suddenly taken with such a constriction of the parts inservient to speech and deglutition, as made her altogether unable either to speak or to swallow any thing at all.—Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 343.

You will in one of the following papers find mention of a learned physician of my acquaintance, that, upon diving leisurely, perceived a constriction to be made of his thorax by the action of the surrounding sea water.
Id. Ib. vol. iii. p. 619.

Of tea what have I said? That I have drunk it twenty years without hurt, and therefore believe it not to be poison; that if it dries the fibres, it cannot soften them; that if it constringes, it cannot relax.
Johnson. Reply to a Paper in the Gazetteer

CONSTRU'E, v. } Lat. Construere, constructum, (con, and struere,) which Vossius suspects is from Στερε-οεω, i. e. firmum solidumque reddere; and thus equivalent to the English verb, to Build, (qv.) and to Construct.
CONSTRU'CT, v.
CONSTRU'CTER.
CONSTRU'CTION.
CONSTRU'CTIONAL.
CONSTRU'CTIVE.
CONSTRU'CTIVELY.
CONSTRU'CTURE.

To build or put, place, fix or fasten, firmly, strongly together; (met.) to put or place or dispose words together in a sentence.

Construction is applied not only to the putting or placing, the disposition or arrangement of words together; but to the whole when so put together; (sc.) the signification, or meaning, the explanation or interpretation.

Construe, v.—Fr. Construire; Sp. Construir; It. Costruire,—is used (met.)—

To put or place, (sc.) the words of one language into the order required by the usages of another; and thus, generally, to show the signification or meaning, the explanation or interpretation; to explain, to interpret.

Lete thy confessour syre kyng construe this in English.
Piers Ploughman, p. 71

Clerkus that were confessours, couple hem togeders
To construe this clause.—Piers Ploughman, p. 71

This prayde he him to construe and declare,
Ful often time upon his knees bare.
Chaucer. The Prioresses Tale, v. 13,458.

And then against them al he construeth that ghospell so folishely, that afore God a man would wene almost that a gosling had as much witte as he.—Sir T. More. Works, p. 392.

For as much as it shal not be taken as the party mēt it, but as it pleaseth yᵗ prince to conster it.—Id. Ib. p. 70.

But geue me leaue to conster you this laste verse.
Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, c. 9.

Conster what this is, and tel not;
For I am fast sworne, I may not.
Wyat. A Riddle of a Gift given by a Ladie.

For (besides the diuersitie betweene construction and trāslation) you know there be many misticall secretes in this writer, which vttered in English would shewe litle pleasour.
Phaer. Virgill. Conclusion.

If therefore you shall impart the same to one, and he to another, and so it pass through my hands, I know not what constructions would be made thereof to my prejudice; for that the hares eares may happily be taken for hornes.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. ii. p. 2.

D. Cole referreth him selfe vnto the construction of the close there written.—Jewell. Replie to M. Hardinge, p. 140.

Mal. My lord you use a borrow'd bravery,
Not suiting fair constructions.
Ford. The Lady's Trial, Act v. sc. 2.

In which, [Collins' Navigation,] besides projections of the sphere, there are constructions for many astronomical problems and spherical propositions.
Wood. Fasti Oxon, an. 1658.

A proud man constructively puts himself out of the number of God's creatures, and deserves to be excluded from his tender providence.—Bates. Scriptural Perfection, c. 3.

Ye sons of art one curious piece devise
From whose constructure motions shall arise.
Blackmore. Creation, b. i.

They who represent the commons of Great Britain, could not but have some fear, that it might justly be construed as an inexcusable breach of duty towards those whom they represent, and a sort of sharing in the guilt of the present conspiracy itself.—Hoadly. Let. signed Britannicus, Let. 15.

The Jews construed those passages of a temporal deliverance from the Roman yoke, and a temporal reign in Palestine. But did they construe them right?
Bp. Horne. Works, vol. iv. The Case of the Jews, Dis. 8.

And yet, by the antient common law, there was a great latitude left in the breast of the judges to determine what was treason, or not so: whereby the creatures of tyrannical princes had opportunity to create abundance of constructive treasons; that is, to raise, by forced and arbitrary constructions, offences unto the crime and punishment of treason, which never were suspected to be such.
Blackstone. Commentaries, b. iv. c. 6.

As if the original grant express either an estate of inheritance, or for life; or no estate at all, which is constructively an estate for life.—Id. Ib. b. ii. c. 10.

The necessity of doing something, and the fear of undertaking much, sinks the historian to a genealogist, the philosopher to a journalist of the weather, and the mathematician to a constructor of dials.—Rambler, No. 103.

CONSTUPRATE. } Fr. Constuprer; Sp. Construpar; Lat. Stuprum.
CONSTUPRA'TION.

To constuprate, ravish, deflower, defile, a woman.

The good gostlye father that constuprated ii. hundred nonnes in his tyme.—Bale. On the Revelat. (1553.) P. iii.

Their wives and lovliest daughters constuprated by every base cullion.—Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 105.

The first are eyes full of adulteries; every glance whereof is an act of beastliness: the very sight is a kind of constupration.—Bp. Hall. Ser. The Fashions of the World.

CONSU'BJECT, v. Lat. Con, and subjicere, subjectum; to throw or cast under, to place under. To consubject is—

To become subjects in union with others; to submit to the same government with others.

But after the destruction of their six first kings which died in the reign of Aes, (they) admitted a seventh of a new family rather then they would consubject themselves with those of Juda and Benjamin, under a more honourable but more heavy yoak.—Raleigh. Hist. of the World, b. ii. c. 19. s. 6.

CONSU'BSIST, v. Lat. Con, and subsistere, to stand or stay under, (sub, and sistere, to stand or stay.) See CONSIST.

To subsist with, in union or together with.

There are some who hold two consubsisting wills, an active and an elective, the latter continually directing the former, how truly, I shall not examine.
Search. Light of Nature, vol. ii. pt. iii. c. 26.

CON-SUBSTA'NTIATE, v. } Fr. Consubstantial; It. Consustanziale; Sp. Consubstancial.
CONSUBSTA'NTIATE, adj.
CONSUBSTANTIA'TION.
CONSUBSTA'NTIAL.
CONSUBSTA'NTIALIST.
CONSUBSTANTIA'LITY.

To unite or co-exist in the same substance; to share or partake of the same nature.

This our Inheritour Christ Jesus, God with God, light of light, coeternall and consubstantiall with the Father and with the Holie Ghost, to the end that he might become our husband (because the husband & the wife must be one bodie & one flesh.)
Foxe. Martyrs. Letter of M. John Bradford, p. 1053.

And how is it like that Marcellinus which died in the twentith yeare of Diocletian, could write of consubstantialitie of the diuine persons when that controuersie & terme of consubstantialitie was not herd of in the Church before Nicene councell, which was twentie-three yeares after him.
Id. Ib. The ten first Persecutions, p. 86.

He that means to learn the secrets of God's wisdom must be, as Plato says, τον λογισμον ζωον ουσιωσεσθαι, his soul must be consubstantiated with reason, not invested with passion, to him that is otherwise, things are but in the dark, his notion is obscure, and his sight troubled.
Bp Taylor, pt iii. Ser. 6.

And then since all love strictly examined arises out of love to ourselves, 'tis no wonder that we must love her, that is thus consubstantiate with us.—Feltham. Lake, xiv. 20.

Or as in spring-time from one sappy twig,
There sprouts another consubstantiall sprig.
Du Bartas. The sixth Day of the first Week.

The Lutheran holds consubstantiation an error indeed, but not mortal.—Milton. Of True Religion.

But all your several churches disagree,
The consubstantiating church and priest
Refuse communion to the Calvinist.
Dryden. The Hind & the Panther.

A Papist shall say 'tis dangerous, because, perhaps, it agrees not so well with transubstantiation; and a Lutheran, because his consubstantiation is in hazard, but neither consider, whether transubstantiation or consubstantiation be true or false, but taking it for granted that they are true, or at least gainful, whatever hits not with it, or is against it, must be dangerous.—Locke. Molyneux to Locke.

Athanasius writing to Epictetus concerning those who held Christ's body to be consubstantial with his divinity, tells him this was so gross a conceit that it needed no solicitous confutation; but that it would be a sufficient answer to say in general the orthodox church was not of that mind, our fathers did not think so.
Tillotson. Rule of Faith, pt. iv. s. 1.

It may serve to guard us from divers errours, such as are that of the Lutheran consubstantiators, and of the Roman transubstantiators, who affirm that the body of our Lord is here upon earth at once present in many places, (namely in every place, where the host is kept, or the Eucharist is celebrated.)—Barrow, vol. ii. Ser. 31.

To settle the controversial bounds between the Arians, and Semiarians, and the Athanasians or consubstantialists of those days, and to determine how far they agreed, and how far they differed, and how far they were or were not consistent with themselves, is, if not an impossibility, yet certainly a very difficult task.—Jortin. On Eccles. Hist.

Had those Platonists been authors, they would not have delivered the doctrine of the soul's consubstantiality with the Deity, and its refusion into him, in the gross manner in which we find it in the books of Trismegist.
Warburton. Divine Legation, b. iii. s. 4.

CONSU'ETUDE. Lat. Con, and suere, to accustom. See DESUETUDE.

Custom.

Wherfore to say yt it is sacrilege, or unlawfull to observe this consuetude or law must bee iudged erronious

Wine, prest in Taurus consulship.
Drant. Horace. Epistle to Torquatus.

Consul.—One of the soveraigne yeerely magistrates in Rome succeeding in the place of KK. so named a consulendo either of asking counsel of the people and senat in state matters and withall giving his own advise, and providing for the good of the weale-publicke; or else of judging, for so consulere signifieth.
Holland. Livie. Exposition of Tearmes.

While the Fecial priests were contending with the senate, for his being delivered to them, he [Fabius] fled for protection, to the people. And so was not only not given, nor punish'd, but by their means, was made a tribune with consular power.—Grew. Cosmo. Sacra, b. iii. c. 3

The beginning of this freedome you must account in regard hereof, That the consulare regiment was annuall, and from yeare to yeare, rather than that the roiall power and jurisdiction that the kings had, was any wit abated and diminished.—Holland. Livie, p. 44.

Answerable whereunto we observe the decussated characters in many consulary coynes, and even in those of Constantine and his sons, which pretend their pattern in the sky.—Brown. Cyrus' Garden, c. 1.

Bearing the honorable offices of preture and consulate he produced upon the stage, to act a comicall and wanton enterlude, the gentlemen and dames of Rome.
Holland. Suetonius, p. 180.

You hear not in Polybius, that it rained blood or stones; that a bull had spoken, or a thousand such impossibilities, with which Livy perpetually crowds the calends of almost every consulship.—Dryden. Character of Polybius.

Nevertheless, (and I am sure you are no stranger to the truth I am going to say,) upon laying down my consular office, he prevented me from making the usual speech to the people: and thus, what had never been denied to the lowest and most worthless of our magistrates, he most injuriously refused to a consul who had preserved the liberties of his country.—Melmoth. Cicero, b. i. Let. 3.

Had I not acted then with spirit in opposition to his ill-considered measures, would not the world have thought (and thought too with reason) that the courage I exerted in my consulate was merely accidental, and not the result of a steady and rational fortitude.—Id. Ib.

CONSU'LT, n.
CONSULTA'TION.
CONSU'LTATIVE.
CONSU'LTER.
CONSU'LTIVE.

Fr. Consulter; Sp. Consultar; It. Consultare; Lat. Consul-ere, consultum, to hold council; to advise with. Of uncertain origin. Martinius says, a con and salio. Qui consulunt rationibus in unam sententiam, quasi saliunt.

To confer thoughts or opinions, to deliberate upon them, to weigh, to examine, them; to seek or require the opinions, thoughts, advice, of another; to advise, to devise; to confer or refer to the thoughts, opinions, knowledge, of others.

Wherfore we pray you, that if we speake a lytle more longe, ye take it not to euill intent and thinke not, that in shewing you, that you shulde mynde to aduyse & consult well of the matter, wherof is question: that we go about to teache you what you haue to do, as though we repute you ignorāt people.—Nicolls. Thucydides, fol. 101.

Against which treatie the vnited prouinces making open protestation, vsed all meanes possible to hinder it, alleaging that it was more requisite to consult how the enemie now pressing vpon them might be repelled from off their frontiers.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 595.

And they were all called, and had theyr voyce in the common consultacyons that were made for the feates of warre.
Nicolls. Thucydides, fol. 35.

And a day and place being appointed, where the consultation should bee kept, in the mean time those miscreants conspired together about the murthering of the king.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 12.

That the law hath been fined by grave and learned men, meaning the professors of the law, is manifestly untrue; for all the laws of England have been made by the kings of England, consulting with the nobility and commons in parliament, of which not one in twenty was a learned lawyer.
Hobbs. Of the Common Laws of England.

In the Lord Cobham's and Sir Walter Ralegh's case, a conspiracy, consult and agreement to promote an insurrection, and procure an invasion, was held an overt-act, 1 Jac. I. and their meeting, consulting and agreeing, was laid as an overt-act, though discovered before the thing took effect.
State Trials. Lord W. Russell, an. 1683.

——— After short silence then
And summons read, the great consult began.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. i.

To this the king of men replied: O father, all the sonnes
Of Greece thou conquerst, in the strife of consultations.
Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. ii.

——— If other hidden cause
Left them superiour, while we can preserve
Unhurt our minds, and understandings sound,
Due search and consultation will disclose.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. vi.

Those who sacrifised their children as the Phœnicians did for a remedy against the plague; as also diviners, observers of times, enchanters, whitches, charmers, consulters with familiar spirits, wizards, and necromancers
Grew. Cosmo. Sacra, b. iv. c. 8.

If it be but consultive to the magistrate, then they say no more than we.—Goodwin. Works, vol. iv. pt. iv. p. 158.

He therefore hath been most consultive about the effecting of this and for the bringing it to its performance according to his own desire.—Id. Ib. vol. v. pt. i. p. 109.

None of them elect or choose the emperour, but only those six princes who have a consultative, deliberative, and determinative power in his election.
Bp. Bramwell against Hobbes, p. 27.

And, Indeed, Cranmer, Ridley, and Cox, were the chief that managed that affair [the review of that communion book]; though they consulted with Bucer and Peter Martyr.
Strype. Memorials. Q. Mary. an. 1554.

When you have gain'd that pass, divide your force;
Your self in person head one chosen half,
And march t' oppose the faction in consult
With dying Dorax.—Dryden. Don Sebastian, Act iv. sc. 1.

A consult of coquettes below
Was call'd, to rig him out a beau.—Swift. Death & Daphne.

By the consultation of books, whether of dead or living authors, many temptations to petulance and opposition, which occur in oral conferences, are avoided
Rambler, No. 87.

The consulters [of the oracles] sometimes wrote their requests, and received answers in writing.
Jortin. On Ecclesiastical History.

CONSU'ME, v.
CONSU'MABLE.
CONSU'MER.
CONSU'MINGLY.
CONSU'MPTION.
CONSU'MPTIVE.

Fr. Consumer; Sp. Consumir; It. Consumare; Lat. Consumere, (con, and sumere;) totum sumere, in nihilum redigere, to take all, reduce to nothing; i.e. sub, and em-ere; which according to Festus signifies, toll-ere, (to till,) to lift up, to take up.

To take the whole; to reduce to nothing, to leave nothing; to devour, waste, or destroy.

Fuller (Worthies, Kent,) coins for himself the adj. Consumptionish.

Behold my picture here wel portrayed for the nones
With hart consumed and falling flesh, behold the very bones.—Uncertaine Auctors. Picture of a Lover

So fine was never yet the cloth,
No smith so hard his yron did beate,
But those consumed was with moth
Together with canker all to freate.
Id. That eche Thing is hurte of itselfe.

Now let vs see what help we may haue of this medicin against the sickness of ðuy, which is vndoubtedly both a sore tormēt & a very consumpcion.—Sir T. More. Works, p. 85.

I dye, though not incontinent;
By processe yet consumingly;
As wast of fire, which doth relent.
Wyat. The Lover lamenteth his Estate, &c.

And all members of the body conspired against the stomacke as against the swallowing gulf of all their labours; for whereas the eyes beheld, the ears heard, the hands laboured, the feet travailed, the tongue spake, and all parts performed their functions, onely the stomache lay idle and consumed all.—Camden Remains. Wise Speeches.

Beastly consumer! not content to eat
The wholesome quarters destin'd for men's meat.
Cotton. On the Great Eater of Gray's Inn.

Another argument drawne from reason, for the world's decay, is, that all the parts of it decay and by degrees grow to dissolution, which should likewise argue a wasting and lingering consumption in the whole.—Hakewill. Apol. p. 55.

By which we are at last brought to this truth—that it was taught by God to Adam, and by him taught to his posterity, that they should in their several manners worship God by giving to him something of all that he had given us: and therefore something of our time, and something of our goods: and as that was to be spent in praises and celebration of his name, so these were to be given in consumptive offerings.—Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. ii. c. 3.

Our coin and treasure will be both ways equally diminished, and can be restor'd only by an over-balance of our whole exportation, to our whole importation of consumable commodities.—Locke. Further Considerations on Money.

When once the necessity appears of paying the duties, and of leaving off the clandestine trade, the price to the consumer must of consequence be immediately advanced.
Hoadly. Letters signed Britannicus, &c. Let. 89.

War, our consumption, was their gainful trade:
We inward bled, whilst they prolong'd our pain:
He fought to end our fighting, and essay'd
To stanch the blood by breathing of the vein.
Dryden. On the Death of Oliver Cromwell.

It [prayer] is not at all consumptive of our time. For we may attend this work, when we are doing other business.
Sharp. Works, vol. i. Ser. 15.

Every new advance of the price to the consumer is a new incentive to him to retrench the quality of his consumption; and if, upon the whole, he pays the same, his property computed by the standard of what he voluntarily pays, must remain the same.—Burke. On a Regicide Peace, Let. 3.

It is as if the dead could feel
The icy worm around them steal,
And shudder as the reptiles creep,
To revel o'er their rotting sleep,
Without the power to scare away
The cold consumers of their clay.—Ld. Byron. Giaour.

The healing art calls in the snails in consumptive cases.
Pennant. Zoology. Worms, c. 6.

CONSU'MMATE, v.
CONSU'MMATE, adj.
CONSU'MMATELY.
CONSUMMA'TION.

Fr. Consommer; Sp. Consumir; It. Consommare; Lat. Con, and summus, (superrimus, supremus, summus, from supra, above.)

To reach the top or summit, the highest or utmost point aimed at or aspired after; to attain, to finish, perfect, fulfil, complete, or accomplish.

There is not a blessing upon earth, that can any way hope or seem to parallel a sober well grounded assurance here, that in time we shall be saints in heaven, 'tis such a paradise upon earth, that heaven itself seems but a second part of it, differing from it rather in degrees and external accomplishments, than in any distinct specifical kind of happiness; (the Lord of heaven by his mighty working, when it shall please him, begin and consummate it in us)
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 565.

Thus broke she off her speech, when as the Muse awhile,
Desirous to repose, and rest her with the Isle,
Here consummates her song, and doth fresh courage take,
With war, in the next book, the Muses to awake.
Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 22

That all the angels and ætherial powers,
They now, and men hereafter, may discern,
From whose consummate vertue I have chose
This perfect man, by merit call'd my Son,
To earn salvation for the sons of men.
Milton. Paradise Regained, b. i.

I will shut up this reason with my witty epigram made vpon one who in his writings vndertooke to foretell the very yeare of the world's consummation.—Hakewill. Apol. p. 23.

And therefore, so long as God is angry with thee, however rich and happy thou mayst think thyself, thou art in hell though thou knowest it not; and there is nothing wanting to consummate thy misery, but the apprehension of thy sad condition.—Bp. Beveridge, vol. ii. Ser. 85.

But he, consummate master, knew
When to recede, and where pursue:
His noble negligences teach
What other's toils despair to reach.—Prior. Alma, c. 2.

Of this match the queen, who had lost so much time, was very fond, and earnestly desirous of the consummation of it; though afterwards she had but little comfort therein.
Strype. Memorials. Queen Mary, an. 1554.

[They] under the conduct of Felix Rogusinus, a Dalmatian, consummately learned in the Greek, Chaldaic, and Arabic languages, and an elegant designer and painter of ornaments on vellum, attended incessantly to the business of transcription and decoration.
Warton. Hist. of English Poetry, vol. ii. s. 16.

When it is said that of his [Christ's] kingdom there shall be no end, the meaning is that it shall not pass away like other kingdoms, and that there shall be no end of it, till the consummation of all things.
Jortin. On the Christian Religion, Dis. 3.

CON-TA'BULATE. Lat. Con. and tabula, a table, (qv.)

To board; to strengthen as with boards.

Bedcords and boards are the best flesh-formers, consolidating, and contabulating his body of errantry into a gum or moving mummia.
Gayton. Notes on Don Quixote, vol. iii. p. 2.

CO'NTACT, n.
CONTA'CTION.
CONTA'GION.
CONTA'GIOUS.
CONTA'GIOUSNESS.

Lat. Conting-ere, actum, to touch together; (con, and tangere, from Gr. Θιγ-εω, or θιγγαν-εω, to touch.) Cont-ages, -agio, -agium, morbus contactu inficiens, (Vossius.) Fr. Contagion; It. Contagione.

Contact is simply touch. Contagion is applied to—

Disease, infecting or communicating itself by contact or touch; but the application of this word is much extended by medical writers. See CONTAMINATE. It is used (met.) for—

Any spreading evil or mischief.

This is a very true saying and maketh welt agaynst his owne purpose, for in deede this contagion began to spring euen in St. Paule's tyme —Frith. Workes, p. 115.

After the whiche reyne ensued so great excedynge nombre and multytude of flyes, the whiche were to the people so noyous and contageous, that they slewe moche people.
Fabyan, vol. i. c. 19.

He thought it best to make a peregrinaciō & take his progresse into the other quarters of his realm yᵗ he might wede, extirpate and purdge the myndes of mē spotted & cōtaminate with the cōtagious smoke of dissencion & preuy factions.—Hall. Hen. VII. an. 1.

Neuertheless I wist neuer none that right said, that any while were enuenomed with your contagiousnesse, that is, contaminated and spotted doctrine.
Fox. Martyrs. The Examin. of W. Thorp, an. 1407.

Now that deleterious it [the basiliak] may be at some distance and destructive with corporeal contaction, what uncertainty soever there be in the effect, there is no high improbability in the relation.—Brown. Vul. Err. b. iii. c. 7.

Why, Mary, could not thine omnipotent Saviour, as well in absence have commanded Lazarus to live? Is his hand so short, that he can do nothing but by contaction.
Bp. Hall. Cont. Lazarus Raised.

Such is the powre of that same fruit, that naught
The fell contagion may thereof restraine;
Ne within reason's rule, her madding mood containe.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. v. c. 7.

For what is this contagious sin of kind,
But a privation of that grace within,
And of that great rich dowry of the mind
Which all had had, but for the first man's sin?
Davies. Immortality of the Soul, s. 8.

Which noysome and pestilent vapor arising forth of a certaine deepe pit, when it once passed the wide mouth thereof, before it was walmed up higher, caused (through the contagiousnesse thereof) the grounds lying round about it to be uninhabitable —Holland. Ammianus, p. 229.

Swell'd by contact of such a fulsome toad,
He lugg'd about the matrimonial load;
Till fortune, blindly kind as well as he,
Has ill restor'd him to his liberty.—Dryden. Ess. on Satire.

He sees the dire contagion spread so fast,
That where it seizes all relief is vain.
And therefore must unwillingly lay waste
That country, which would, else, the foe maintain.
Id. Annus Mirabilis, s. 244.

But first, by ardent prayer, and clear lustration,
Purge the contagious spots of human weakness.
Impure no mortal can behold Apollo.
Prior. Second Hymn of Callimachus.

Those corpuscles, that impregnate the Egyptian air upon the swelling of the Nile, are able to put a speedy stop, not only to the contagiousness, but to the malignity of the plague, even when it is assisted by the summer heat, which at Grand Cairo is wont to be excessive.—Boyle. Works, vol. v. p. 66.

They [the barking shark] will permit a boat to follow them, without accelerating their motion till it comes almost within contact.—Pennant. British Zoology. Barking Shark.

Their propensity to recount the wonderful exceeds all imagination. Neither their learning, judgment, nor integrity, could secure them against the general contagion.

There are also manye other thynges whyche Jesus dyd: the whiche yf they should be wrytten euery one I suppose the worlde could not contayne the bokes that should be wrytten.—Bible, 1551. John, c. 21.

Whereas also we euidently gathered out of the contents of your letter, that you are in like sort readie and willing to put all things in practice, which are by you and your subiects louingly to be performed.—Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 141.

And for this cause as a godly continent prince, cleane and faultlesse of hym selfe, sent out of heauen into thys vicious worlde, for the amendement of men's maners, he caused the byshop of London to putte her [Jane Shore] to open penaunce, goyng before a crosse one Sondaye at procession with a taper in her hand.—Hall. Edw. V.

And some also thinke it was called Anglia of Angulus, which is in English a corner, for that it is but a corner in respect of the mayne and continent land of the whole world.
Grafton. Briteyn, pt. iv.

The variable humours of all sortes of people [in France] might haue had very ample and manifold occasions of good and honest employment abroad in that large and fruitful continent of the West Indies.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. ii. Epist. Ded.

And then cōtinently folowing, to thētent that we should se that it is not with oute necessitye, that the pauyce (i. e. the shield) of God should compasse vs about vpon euerye syde he sheweth, &c.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 1180.

He that cannot otherwise liue continently, let him marrie.
Fox. Martyrs. Marage of Preests defended, p. 159.

But nowe Christen men be as euill or woorse then heretikes or Gentiles, yea & greater continencie is found among thē than among Christen men.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 755.

You, who prepare to reade graue Beaumont's verse,
And at your entrance view my lowly straines,
Expect no flatt'ring prayses to reherse,
The rare perfections, which this booke contains.
Beaumont. To my deare Father Sir J. Beaumont.

And you, fair eyes, containers of my bliss,
Motives of love, born to be matched never,
Entombed in your sweet circles, sleep for ever.
Daniel. Complaint of Rosamond.

To whom thus Belial in like gamesome mood,
Leader, the terms we sent, were terms of weight,
Of hard contents, and full of force urg'd home,
Such as we might perceive amus'd them all,
And stumbl'd many.—Milton. Paradise Lost, b. vi.

——— In particular then
I told our pylot, that past other men
He most must beare firme spirits; since he swaid
The continent that all our spirits conuaid
In his whole guide of her.—Chapman. Hom. Odus b. xii.

He [Xerxes] commanded a passage for gallies to be cut behind mount Athos, making the same (with the half island or headland, where it stood) to be an entire island, sundering thereby from the continent of Thrace, five cities, besides the mountain and the Chersonesus or neck of land itself.
Raleigh. Hist. of the World, b. iii. c. 5. s. 2.

A rare example, that lust, fired by youth, power and opportunity, and enflamed by beauty, should be abated into continence, by only meeting with a native modesty.
Felthem, pt. i. Res. 16.

The valorous Persian, who not once but gaz'd
On faire Panthea's face to ease his toyle;
His glory, by that continency, rais'd
More than by Babylon's and Lydia's spoyle.
Stirling. A Paræneus to Prince Henry.

And when he [Cranmer] came to the last part of his task, he boldly owned his books, avowing the truths in them contained, and disclaimed the Roman doctrine.
Strype. Memorials. Queen Mary, an. 1555.

The air containable within the cavity of the scolipile, amounted to eleven grains, and somewhat more.
Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 85.

Because no humane inventions were to be allowed about the worship of God, he had cut out of his Bible the contents of the chapters, and titles of the leaves, and so left the bare text, without binding or covers.—Stillingfleet, vol. ii. Ser. 1.

Tyrannic force is that which least you fear;
The sound is frightful in a Christian's ear:
Avert it, heaven! nor let that plague be sent
To us from the dispeopled continent.
Dryden. The Hind & the Panther.

The intimation to Adam—that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head was undoubtedly very obscure. But yet it contained some foundation for a hope, that the great evil, introduced by the fall of man, should hereafter be repaired.—Gilpin, vol. i. Ser. 1.

Among artificial substances the ship [nafis, navis] is feminine, as being so eminently a receiver and container of various things, of men, arms, provisions, goods, &c.
Harris. Hermes, b. i. c. 4.

Scarce had he gone when a young lad came by,
And, as the purse lay just before his eye,
He took it up; and finding its content,
Secur'd the treasure, and away he went.
Byrom. Moses's Vision.

No continental power was willing to lose any of its continental objects for the increase of the naval power of Great Britain; and Great Britain would not give up any of the objects she sought for as the means of an increase to her naval power to further their aggrandizement.
Burke. Regicide Peace, Let. 2

As then the church had also a great number of persons of both sexes, who consecrated themselves to God by a perfect continence, nothing was more reasonable than to choose its principal ministers out of this upper part of the flock.
Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History.

When a young fellow, just come from the play of Cleomenes, told Mr. Dryden, in raillery against the continency of his principal character, "If I had been alone with a lady, I should not have passed my time like your Spartan." "That may be," answered the bard with a very grave face: "but give me leave to tell you, sir, you are no hero."
Cambridge. Scribleriad, b. vi.

CONTA'MINATE, v. CONTA'MINATE, adj. CONTAMINA'TION. } Fr. Contaminer; Sp. Contaminar; It. Contaminare; Lat. Contamin-are, atum; con, and the obsolete tamin-are, which Vossius thinks is from the Hebrew. Lennep supposes that tagimen, contractè tamen, (from tag-ere, whence tang-ere,) gave birth to the verb tamino, and the compound contamino; and thus, contaminatio and contagio will have the same origin, and have, with very little difference, the same application. Contagion is more particularly limited to the spreading of disease by contact. Contamination to that of any other defilement.

To stain, to distain, to defile, to pollute; to corrupt, (sc.) the purity, the integrity.

Idoles ar so to be detested of the faithful & godly man, that they should not be in his mouthe or tonge, least yᵉ talke had of thē should seme to cōtaminat and defile him.
Calvine. Foure Godlie Sermons, Ser. 1.

I am glad you shall come home; and would wish you were at home, out of that country so contaminate with innocent blood, that the sun cannot look upon it but to prognosticate the wrath and vengeance of God.
Strype. Life of Sir T. Smith, c. 13. an. 1572.

He could finde in his heart to be killed instantly, least if he live longer, some sorrow or sickness should contaminate his joyes.—Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 507.

That bird and beast incontinently fly,
From the detested and contagious stink,
And rather choose by cruel thirst to die,
Then once to taste of this contaminate drink.
Drayton. Moses his Birth & Miracles, b. ii.

We take what he gives: no man's mouth shall condemne my refuter but his owne. What was he that accused marriage of vnholinesse, out of sancti estote, of uncleannesse, out of omnia munda mundis, of contamination with carnal concupiscence? Was it not his owne Pope Innocentius?
Bp. Hall. Honour of the Maried Clergie.

There is a poison behind, which will contaminate and eat through all this happiness.
Hoadly. Letters of Britannicus, Let. 65.

Even when the nobility, which represented the more permanent landed interest, united themselves by marriage (which sometimes was the case) with the other description, the wealth, which saved the family from ruin, was supposed to contaminate and degrade it.
Burke. Reflections on the French Revolution.

CONTE'CK. Mr. Tyrwhitt says, is Saxon. Skinner,—a corruption of contest.

Conteke with blody knif, and sharp manace.

—— I found some contecke and debate,
In regiment where I was woont to rule.
Gascoigne. The Fruits of Warre.

Let not mislike of that may not be amended.
So conteck, soone by concord, mought be ended.
Spenser. Shepherd's Calendar. May.

But kindle coals of conteck and yre,
Wherewith they set all the world on fire.
Id. Ib. September.

CONTE'CTION. Lat. Contey-ere, ctum, (con, and tegere, to cover.)
A covering.

Fig-leaves were aptly formed for such contection of those parts.—Brown. Miscellaneous Tracts, p. 15.

CONTE'MN, v. CONTE'MNER. CONTE'MNING, n. CONTE'MPT, n. CONTE'MPTFUL. CONTE'MPTIBLE. CONTE'MPTIBLENESS. CONTE'MPTIBLY. CONTEMPTIBI'LITY. CONTE'MPTUOUS. CONTE'MPTUOUSLY. CONTE'MPTUOUSNESS. Fr. Contemner, contempteur, contemptible; Lat. Contemnere, (con, and temn-ere,) from the Gr. Τεμν-ειν, secare, abscindere, quia quod aspernamur, hoc amputamus atque abscindimus, to cut, because that which we despise, we cut away, (Perottus.) And Vossius, (in v. Sperno, which he derives from Σπειρ-ειν, spargere, to scatter, to toss away,) observes,—Ita proprie sperni dicetur; quod per viam spargitur, ut temni, quod abscinditur. Of similar consequential application is the word ANJECT. And see CONTEMPLATE.

To throw or toss aside, (sc.) as of no value; to abject, to spurn, to disdain, to despise, to neglect.

Therfore if ghe han worldli domes, ordeyne ghe tho contemptible men that ben in the churche to deme.
Wiclif. 1 Corynth. c. 6.

A visage sterne, and milde: where both did growe,
Vice to contemne, in vertue to rejoyce:
Amid great stormes, whom grace assured so,
To liue vpright, and smile at fortunes choyce.
Surrey. On the Death of Sir T. W.

He was I heard say a seditious man, a contemner of common prayer, I wold there were no mo in England: wel he is gone. I wold he had lefte none behind him.
Latimer. Seventh Serm. before King Edward.

Yet his highnes is advertised and informed, that diuers of his subjects be not only to al these more slow and negligent, but rather contemners and despisers of such good and godly acts and deeds.—Strype. Originals. Procl. Ed. VI. an. 1.

For these are the rules wherein we must exercise our self, that we may be confirmed in the faith, in ye feare of God, in humes, finally in contempte of the world and loue of the heauenly life.—Calvine. Foure Godlie Sermons, Ser. 3.

Upon your information to us thereof, we shal so aid and assist you in the execution of justice and punishment of al such contemptuous offenders, as the same shall be example to others.—Strype. Orig. The Ld. Protect. to the Justices.

And is not the abbot now worthy to be corrected, which al this notwithstanding, hath caused the monk contemptuously stil to continue his lecture? Had not I been worthy correction, if I had contemptuously disobeyed your letter lately addressed unto me, having the equivalency of a inhibition?—Id. Ib. No. 61. Shackston, Bp. Salisb. to Cromwel.

True fame is ever likened to our shade,
He soonest misseth her, that most [haste] hath made
To overtake her; whoso takes his wing,
Regardlesse of her, she'll be following:
Her true proprietie she thus discovers,
"Loves her contemners, and contemns her lovers."
Browne. Britannia's Pastorals, b. ii. s. 2.

Security is the bane of good successe; it is no contemning of a foyled enemy: the shame of a former disgrace and miscarriage, whets his valor & sharpens it to revenge: no power is so dreadfull, as that which is recollected from an overthrow.—Bp. Hall. Cont. Ahab & Benhadad.

Men so the world shall love, religion hate,
That all true zeal shall in contempt be brought,
The spirituall lights' eclipse shall grow so great,
That lyes the truth, truth shall a lie be thought
Stirling. Doome-Day. The Second Houre.

And should we hear a continued oration, upon such a subject as the stage treats on, in such words as we hear some sermons; I am confident, it would not only be far more tedious, but nauseous and contemptful.
Feltham, pt. I. Resolve 20.

A Nazarite in place abominable,
Vaunting my strength in honour to their Dagon?
Besides, how vile, contemptible, ridiculous;
What act more execrably unclean, prophane?
Milton. Samson Agonistes, l. 1361.

Zacharie telleth Boniface, that it is according to the old canons, that Bishops should not be placed in such smal cities, but in more ample and large cities, bycause the contemptiblenesse of the place, dothe oftentimes bring contempt to the person, and a bvshop ought to be esteemed and reuerenced.—Whitgift. Defence, p. 443.

The contemptibility and vanity of this effeminate argument detains vs longer, then for the quality thereof were fitting, did not so much mischiefe issue out of it.
Speed. Edward II. b. ix. c. 11.

Detesting the rude spoils, done by the armed throng,
The mad tumultuous world contemptibly forsook,
And to his quiet cell by Crowland him betook.
Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 24.

Not as our English, he stood and prayed thus with himself, but as the words will likewise bear it, he stood by himself thus, this posture signifying a proud contemptuous behaviour, whilst the publican stood crouching humbly, tremblingly behind.—Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 607.

And thou, the queen of isles Great Britain why do ye
Your grandsire's godlike name (with a neglectful ear)
In so reproachful terms and ignominy bear,
By every one of late contemptuously disgraced.
Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 10.

[This] temper they learnt of their lord and master, who complyed with many things, that others might not take advantage by his omission of them, to slight and contemn them.—Stillingfleet, vol. ii. Ser. 1.

I am ridiculously enough accused to be a contemner of universities, that is, in other words, an enemy of learning, without the foundation of which I am sure no man can pretend to be a poet.—Dryden. Dedication of the Assignation.

After my fancy had run over the most obvious and common calamities which men of mean fortunes are liable to, it descended to these little insults and contempts, which, tho' they may seem to dwindle into nothing, when a man offers to describe them, are perhaps in themselves more cutting and insupportable than the former.—Spectator, No. 150.

That the interest of Christianity may not suffer by my silence, nor the contemptibleness of his treatise afford him matter of triumph amongst those who lay any weight on such boasting, 'tis fit it should be shewn what an arguer he is, and how well he deserves for his performance to be dubb'd by himself irrefragable.
Locke. Second Vind. of the Reason. of Christianity.

For I hope you do not think, how contemptibly soever you speak of the venerable mob, as you are pleased to dignifie them, that the bulk of mankind, or in your phrase, the rabble are not concerned in religion, or ought to understand it in order to their salvation.—Id. Ib.

If the devil should have a mind to tempt, by suggesting of thoughts, he would tempt a proud man, by filling his mind with foolish and vain conceits of himself, and contemptuous thoughts of other men.—Sharp, vol. iii. Ser. 5.

I follow trembling: for the cliffs are high,
And hov'ring round them watchful harpies fly,
To snatch the poet's wreath with envious claws,
And hiss contempt for merited applause.
Wilkie. Epigoniad, b. I.

Next, when the mother abbess came,
With an authoritative look,
The feather'd libertine to blame,
Contemptuously his tail he shook.—Coop. Ver-Vert, c. 4.

CON-TE'MPER, v. CONTE'MPERATE, v. CONTEMPERA'TION. CONTE'MPERATURE. CONTE'MPERAMENT. CONTE'MPERING, n. Lat. Con, and temperare, from Tempus, time, habere rationem temporis; to have regard, to take account of time. See TEMPER, and TEMPORISE. To time, to season, to suit to the time or season, to adapt, to regulate, to bring within order or measure, to moderate, (sc.) by intermixture;—and thus, to intermix; to qualify or mitigate the qualities; and thus, to diminish, to dilute.

It is moderation, by which this inferior world stands: since that wise and great God, who hath ordained the continuance of it, hath decreed so to contemper all the parts thereof, that none of them should exceed the bounds of their own proportion and degree, to the prejudice of the other.
Bp. Hall. Christian Moderation, b. I. Introd.

As for the condition he interposeth, that I must shew this before the contemperation of affairs to the civil constitutions of cities and provinces, I confess that to be a rigourous condition.—Hammond. Works, vol. ii. p. 59.

But that all the gods who were before at discord and debate, by reason of their dissimilitude, and whatsoever else jarred, grew to accord and consonance one with another, whereof the cause was the contemperature, moderation and order of number and harmony, the very poets were not ignorant of.—Holland. Plutarch, p. 857.

As therefore dead flies corrupt the ointment of the apothecary, or as poison vitiates holsome food: so the contempering of some inferior virtues with more transcendant vices in our stage players, doth either turn these virtues into poyson, or else deprive them of their efficacie.
Prynne. Histrio Mastix, pt. I. p. 97

It is a manifest sign of the Creator's management and care, in placing the terraqueous globe at that very distance it is from the sun; and contempering our own bodies, and all other things, so duly to that distance.
Derham. Physico-Theology, b. ii. c. 5. Note a.

The mighty Nile and Niger; which do not only moisten and contemperate the air by their exhalations, but refresh and humectate the earth by their annual inundations.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. vi. c. 10.

I would further know, why this contemperation of light and shade, that is made, for example, by the skin of a ripe cherry, should exhibit a red, and not a green, and the leaf of the same tree should exhibit a green, rather than a red.
Boyle. Works, vol. I. p. 695.

From which observation it appears, that there is pretty nearly an equal contemperament of the warmth of our bodies, to that of the hottest part of the atmosphere inhabited by us.—Derham. Physico-Theology, b. i. c. 2. Note 3.

I conceive very great hopes of Mr. Parker, but I do always wish, that such juvenile felicities could receive a contemperament for their conduct from some that are better seasoned by longer time.—Boyle. Works, vol. vi. p. 418.

What am I altered, whether colour be a quality emergent from the different contemperatures of the elements, or whether it be only the reflection of the light upon the different situation of the parts of the body.—South, vol. ix. Ser. 9.

CONTE'MPLATE, v. CONTEMPLA'TION. CONTE'MPLATIVE. CONTE'MPLATIVELY. CONTE'MPLATOR. Fr. Contempler; Sp. Contemplar; It. Contemplare; Lat. Contemplare, (con, and templum,) which, J. Scaliger thinks, is from Gr. Τεμενος, (from τεμν-ειν, secare, abscindere,) q. a place cut off, separated, set apart, (see CONTEMN;) and thus—

Consecrated,—Deo alicui vel heroi; and as these places were so chosen that the structure raised upon them might be seen, viewed, observed from all sides;—hence, to contemplate is—

To view, to behold, to observe, to consider, mark, gaze upon, (sc.) as an object of attention; to muse, to meditate upon, think of, reflect upon, study.

—— Freres go to scole
And lerne logyk and lawe, and eke contemplation.
Piers Ploughman, p. 406.

My minde is rapte in contemplation,
Wherein my dazeled eyes onely beholde,
The blacke houre of my constellation,
Which framed me so luckelesse on the molde.
Gascoigne. Hearbes.

But the Psalmes and contemplatife meditacions, on which your highnesse, in the lieu and place of vayne courtely pastimes and gaming, doeth bestow your night and daies studie, and whiche, &c.—Udal. Luke, Pref.

Will puts in practice what the wit deviseth;
Will ever acts, and wit contemplates still;
And as from wit the pow'r of wisdom riseth,
All other virtues daughters are of will.
Davies. Immortality of the Soul. s. 27.

To it he sung the glorious deeds, of great heroes dead,
And his true minde, that practice fulfil'd, sweet contemplation fed.—Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. ix

Since neither wealth, nor honour, arms nor arts,
Kingdom nor empire pleases thee, nor aught
By me propos'd in life contemplative,
Or active, tended on by glory, or fame,
What dost thou in this world.—Milton. Par. Reg. b. iv.

And so contemplatively heere
I with contentment stay.—Warner. Albion's Eng b. vii. c. 37.

Some few others sought after him [God] but as Aristotle saith the Geometer doth, after a right line only, ὁ ἕνεκα τοῦ ἀληθοῦς, as a contemplator of truth, but not as the knowledge of it is any way useful or conducible to the ordering, or bettering of their lives.
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 642

Come, see thy friend retir'd without regret,
Forgetting care, or striving to forget;
In easy contemplation soothing time
With morals much, and now and then with rhyme.
Congreve. Letter to Lord Cobham.

A proper and effectual remedy for this wandering of thoughts I would be glad to find. He, that shall propose such an one, would do great service to the studious and contemplative part of mankind, and perhaps help unthinking men to become thinking.—Locke. On Hum. Underst. s. 39.

It is very possible (to add that upon the bye) that after the light of the moon has (according to what I lately noted) represented to our contemplator the qualifications of a preacher, it may also put him in mind of the duty of a hearer.
Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 462.

To Contemplation's sober eye
Such is the race of man:
And they that creep, and they that fly,
Shall end where they began.—Gray. Ode on Spring.

Pliny may be considered in these letters as writing his own memoirs; every epistle is a kind of historical sketch, wherein we have a view of him in some striking attitude, either of active or contemplative life.

These men go on both sides contentiously to obtaine their minds, contending whether this image or that image hath byn offered vnto, kissed, censed, or otherwise abused.
Fox. Martyrs. Letter for Abolishing Images.

Methinks those grave contenders about opinionative trifles, look like aged Socrates upon his boy's hobby horse, or like something more ludicrous: since they make things their aeria, which are scarce tolerable in their sportful intervals.
Glanvill. The Vanity of Dogmatizing, c. 23.

For let me tell you, salvation will not be obtained at such a rate as this; no, there must be great strugglings and labour, with earnest contendings, if ever you intend to be saved.
Hopkins, Ser. 24.

But when the wills of divers men produce such actions as are reciprocally resistant one to the other, this is called contention.—Hobbs. Human Nature, c. 12.

O goodly vsage of those antique times!
In which the sword was seruant vnto right;
When not for malice and contentious crimes,
But all for praise, and proof of manly might,
The martiall brood accustomed to fight.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. iii. c. 1.

It is very strange that those, who contend so much for the Scriptures being a perfect rule of all things pertaining to worship and discipline, should be able to produce nothing in so necessary a point.—Stillingfleet, vol. ii. Ser. 6.

In all notable changes and revolutions, the contendents have been still made a prey to the third party.—L'Estrange.

Those who see least into things are usually the fiercest contenders about them: and such eager disputants are fitter to make quarrels than to end them; for they can be contentious for peace sake, and make new differences about the ways of vanity.—Stillingfleet, vol. ii. Ser. 6.

But when your troubled country call'd you forth,
Your flaming courage and your matchless worth,
Dazzling the eyes of all that did pretend,
To fierce contention gave a prosperous end.
Waller. A Panegyric to my Lord Protector.

The justices were to apprehend and take all such as did contentiously and tumultuously, with companies or routs, dispute, argue or reason, maintain or define the questions before mentioned.—Strype. Memorials. Edw. VI. an. 1548.

Do not contentiousness and cruelty and study of revenge seldom fail of retaliation?—Bentley, Ser. 1.

For all things, so as may please God, without contentiousness and with truth being examined, ought so to be established by our religiousness.
Barrow. Of the Pope's Supremacy, pt. ii.

Hail, ye who share the stern Minerva's power;
Who arm the hand of liberty for war:
And give to the renown'd Britannic name
To awe contending monarchs.
Akenside. Hymn to the Naiads.

It is sometimes of service, that our examples should be near us; and such as raise a reverence, sufficient to induce us carefully to observe them, yet not so great as to prevent us from engaging with them in something like generous contention.—Sir J. Reynolds, Dis. 14.

——— The Muse's haunt,
The marble porch, where wisdom went to talk
With Socrates or Tully, hears no more,
Save the hoarse jargon of contentious monks,
Or female superstition's midnight prayer.

CONTE'NT, n.
CONTENTA'TION.
CONTE'NTION.
CONTE'NTED, adj.
CONTE'NTEDLY.
CONTE'NTEDNESS.
CONTE'NTFUL.
CONTE'NTLESS.
CONTE'NTLY.
CONTE'NTMENT.

Fr. Contenter, content; It. Contentare, contento; Sp. Contentar, contento; Lat. Contentus, qui continet, quod animo satisfaciat. And thus—

Satisfied, having enough, sufficient, having no wish for ought more or different; pleased or gratified with what we have. See the quotation from Cogan.

Why do not we then being poore beare it wisely, rather then by lusts seeke riches vniustly, and shewe our selues contented with God's ordinance.—Sir J. Cheke. Hurt of Sedition.

Whan the seneshall of Guyngnape and the other knightes sawe these socours cõmyng, tha they sayd to the byshoppe, sir, ye may well leaue your treaty: for they sayd, they were not cõtent as than to folow his counsayle.
Bernere. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. i. c. 81.

And that done, he cõmaunded inquyry to be made of his accessaryes of ye whiche he punyshed by dyuers maner of turmẽtys and dethes, to the great cõtentacion of the countrey.
Fabyan, vol. i. c. 230.

We bode behind, four monethe or little lesse,
But wherevpon that God he knowes—not I,
Yet if I might be bold to giue a guess,
Then would I say it was for to eaple,
What raunsome we would pay contentedly.
Gascoigne. The Fruites of Warre.

All being sayd and done (as appeared) to his contentment, he licenced me and my whole company to depart, who were all in his presence, and were saluted by him with a nod of his head.—Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 377.

O welcome easie yoke, sweet bondage come,
I seek not from thy toiles for to be shielded,
But I am well content to be o'ercome,
Since that I must commaund when I haue yielded.
Stirling. Aurora, s. 10.

If there be any happinesse to be found upon earth, it is in that which we call contentation: this is a flower that grows not in every garden: the great Doctor of the Gentiles tells us that he had it; I have learned (saith he) in what estate soever I am, therewith to be content.
Bp. Hall. Of Contentation.

Wishing me like to one more rich in hope,
Featur'd like him, like him with friends possess'd,
Desiring this man's art, and that man's scope,
With that I most enjoy contented least.—Shakes. Son. 29.

And there with moderate meat, and wine, and fire,
Have pass'd the hours contentedly with chat,
Now talk'd of this, and then discours'd of that,
Spoke our own verses 'twixt ourselves, if not
Other men's lines. Drayton. Of Poets & Poesy.

This question requireth a long answer, and specially unto such men as place felicity in riches, in possessions, and in the greatness of empire, rather than in the quiet safety, peace, and concord of a commonweal, and in clemency and justice, joyned with contention.—North. Plutarch, p. 65.

Miracles, which when they met with a passive willingness, a contentedness in the patient to receive and believe them, were then the ordinary instruments of faith and conversion, would have been but cast away upon obdurate hearts.
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 622

Parnassus him containes, plast in the quire
With poets: what then can we more desire
To haue of him? perhaps an empty voyce,
While him we wrong with our contentlesse choyce
Beaumont. A Congratulation to the Muses

Leon. Come, we'l away unto your country house,
And there we'l learn to live contently.
Beaum. & Fletch. Rule a Wife, &c. Act iv. sc. 1

For who did ever yet, in honour, wealth,
Or pleasure of the sense, contentment find?
Who ever ceas'd to wish, when he had health,
Or, having wisdom, was not vex'd in mind?
Davies. The Immortality of the Soul, s. 30

O the base degenerate spirits of mankind! that they should be contented to lead the life of brutes (and it would be well if they could die like them too) when it is in their power to live like angels, and God himself.—Sharp, vol. ii. Ser. 5.

A wise content his even mind secur'd,
By want not shaken, nor by wealth allur'd.
Smith. In Memory of Mr. John Philips.

And thus saying, and thinking, we may bear the heaviest load that can be laid upon us, with contentedness, at least, if not with cheerfulness.—Atterbury, vol. ii. Ser. 1.

Now by contentfull submission to God's disposal of things, we do worthily express our due regard to both these, avowing his right, and approving his exercise thereof; but by discontent and regret at what happeneth, we do in effect injure God in both these respects, disavowing his right, and impeaching his management.—Barrow, vol. iii. Ser. 6.

In coverts, (where the few frequent)
If virtue deigns to dwell:
'Tis thus, the little lamp content,
Gives lustre to her cell.—Cunningham. Contemplation.

Many would contentedly suffer the consequences of their own mistakes, rather than the insolence of him who triumps as their deliverer.—Rambler, No. 87.

Contentment expresses the acquiescence of the mind in the portion of good we possess.—Cogan. On the Passions, c. 2.

CON-TE'RMINATE, adj.
CONTE'RMINOUS.
CONTE'RMINABLE.

Lat. Con, and terminus; Gr. Τερμων, ονος, a bound or limit.

Having the same bounds or limits.

Ethiopia being the conterminate region of Egypt, and not divided so much as by a river.
Raleigh. Hist. of the World, b. i. c. 8. s. 10.

There succeeded in the same place the departure of my no less dear niece, your long, and I dare say, your still beloved consort, (for love and life are not conterminable.)
Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 477.

This conformed so many of them as were conterminous to the colonies and garrisons to the Roman laws.—Hale.

CON-TERRA'NEAN. Lat. Con, and terraneus; terra, the land. See TER.

Of the same land, earth, or country.

I hold also that of the orator to be a wild extravagant speech, when he said, that if women were not conterranean and mingled with men, angels would descend and dwell among us.—Howell, b. iv. Let. 6.

CON-TESSARA'TION. Lat. Tessara; Gr. Τεσσαρα, that is, four; Fr. Tessere; squared, or made four-square, like a die; and thus—checked or chequered, variegated.

A variety, an assemblage of various appearances.

The first shall be the agreement and contesseration, both in judgment and practice with the primitive church: to whose example doubtless, the nearer we draw, the more we shall approach towards purity and perfection.
Bp. Hall. Imposition of Hands.

By instituting it after supper, Luke, xxii. 20. Christ was pleased to signify to us, that it should be a contesseration of charity among all Christians.
Hammond. Works, vol. i. p. 124.

The holy symbols of the eucharist were intended to be a contesseration, and an union of Christian societies to God, and with one another.—Bp. Taylor. Real Presence, s. 1.

CONTE'ST, v.
CO'NTEST, n.
CONTESTA'TION.
CONTE'STINGLY.
CONTE'STLESS.

Fr. Contester; Sp. Contestar; It. Contestare; Lat. Contestari, (con, and testari,) to witness together. See ATTEST.

To call or take to witness; to bring forward or produce witnesses on each side; to try by witnesses on each side; and then simply to contend, to dispute, to debate, to litigate.

Contestation is used by Barrow simply for,—proof by witnesses, testimony.

The protector, whether thinking to speed better by submission than by contesting, or perhaps finding himself not altogether innocent, subscribed an acknowledgment with his own hand.—Stow. Edward VI. an. 1550.

——— Inexplicable
Thy justice seems; yet to say truth, too late,
I thus contest; then should have been refus'd
These terms whatever, when they were propos'd.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. x.

Though this of old no less contest did move,
Than when for Homer's birth, seven cities strove.
Denham Cooper's Hill.

In confidence whereof, the said Jesus bearing himself bold; first fell into contestation, and afterward into an open brawle with his brother in the very temple; and therein provoked him so far that his brother slew him on the place.
Usher. Annals, an. 3602.

And the more contestingly they set their reason to explain them, the more intricate they, perhaps, will find them at that conjuncture.—Mountague. Devout Ess. Treat. 19. s. 8.

And therefore he that will look into the history of England, will find, the prerogative was always largest in the hands of our wisest and best princes: because the people observing the whole tendency of their actions to be the publick good, contested not what was done without law to that end.—Locke Of Civil Government, c. 14.

Every man, who is read in church history, knows that belief was drawn up after a long contestation with Arius, concerning the divinity of our blessed Saviour, and his being one substance with the Father.
Dryden. Religio Laici, Pref

We as well are baptised into the name of the Holy Spirit as of the Father and Son, wherein is signified and by a solemn contestation ratified, on the part of God, that those three joyned and confederated (as it were) are conspiringly propitious and favourable to us.—Barrow, vol. ii. Ser. 34.

The excellence of Christian morality will not be contested by fair and candid adversaries; and the few objections which may be made to it are grounded on passages not rightly understood, nor justly interpreted.
Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History.

And whenever the patrons of liberty shall give this advantage to the enemies of it, as much of that popularity which the first lose, the other will gain; and so, the contest becoming more equal, force alone must decide.
Warburton. Works vol. x. Ser. 19.

——— Modest sense
Of my unequal worth compell'd some doubting,
But now 'tis truth contestless. Aaron Hill

CONTE'X, v.
CONTE'XT, v.
CONTE'XT, adj.
CO'NTEXT, n.
CONTE'XTURE.
CONTE'XTURAL.

Fr. Contexte; It. Contesto; Sp. Contexto; Lat. Contextum, past part. of Contex-ere, to enfold, enwrap, or weave together; con, and tex-ere, q. tego-ere, from tegere, to cover. Invicem teginus tramam et stramen, (Cæsar Scaliger.)

Fr. Contexte is well explained by Cotgrave. A whole web, composition, work, or an interlacing, joyning or weaving together; also the form or stile of a process, book, or discourse.

If the subject be history, or contexted fable, then I hold it better put in prose, or blanks: for ordinary discourse, never shows so well in meter, as in the straine that it may seem to be spoken in.—Feltham, pt. i. Resolve 71.

If there be not then, what matters it, what in other places it signify, whensoever the adjuncts or context so determine it, unless it do (or can be pretended to do) so here?
Hammond. Works, vol. ii. p. 182.

In a contexture where one part does not always depend upon another, where things of different natures intervene and interrupt the first intentions, there it is not always very probable to expound Scripture, and take its meaning by its proportion to the neighbouring words.
Bp. Taylor. Liberty of Prophesying, s. 4.

That understanding, which is peculiar to man, is the understanding not only his will, but the framing his conceptions and thoughts, by the sequel and contexture of the names of things into affirmations, negations, and other forms of speech.—Hobbs. Leviathan, pt. i. c. 2.

Yet it is evident, that either by the plastic principle alone, or that and heat together, or by some other cause capable to contex the matter, it is yet possible, that the matter may be anew contrived into such bodies.
Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 529.

Its humours, and its inward tunicks, are indeed tender, proportionate to their tender, curious uses: but the coats, without, are context and callous, firm and strong.
Derham. Physico-Theology, b. iv. c. 3.

To this I answer plainly according to all the light that the contexts afford in this matter; to eat Christ's flesh and to drinke his blood (as our Saviour speaks of it in this chapter) is no more than to come to him, or to believe in him.
Sharp. Works, vol. vii. Ser. 15.

God Almighty, in the fabric of the universe, first contemplated himself, and reflected on his own excellencies, from which he drew and constituted those first forms which are called ideas; so that every species which was afterwards expressed, was produced from that first idea, forming that wonderful contexture of all created beings.
Dryden. A Parallel of Poetry and Painting.

The sense is fine, and easily apprehended by the context: the words are obscure to a fault, and the transition too sudden and violent.—Hart. Thebaid of Statius, b. 6. N.

Collateral events are so artfully woven into the contexture of his [Knolles] principal story, that they cannot be disjoined without leaving it lacerated and broken.
Rambler, No. 122.

CONTIGNA'TION. Lat. Contignatio, trabium tignorumque textura: tignum a tegendo.
A contexture or connexion of beams.

That where more of these orders than one, shall be set in several stories or contignations, there must be an exquisite care to place the columnes precisely one over another, that so the solid may answer the solid, and the vacuities to the vacuities, as well for the beauty as strength of the fabrick.
Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 26.

If their desires cannot be bounded, yet their motions must, when they have the full sight of heaven above them they cannot climb up into it, they cannot possibly see that whole glorious contignation; and when the whole earth lies open before them, they can measure but some small peeces of it.—Bp. Hall. The Free Prisoner.

CONTI'GUOUS, adj.
CONTI'GUOUSLY.
CONTI'GUOUSNESS.
CONTI'GUATE, adj.
CONTIGU'ITY.

Fr. Contigu; Lat. Contiguus, from Contingere, (con, and tangere, to touch.) See CONTINGENT.

Touching one another, close together, neighbouring, bordering or adjoining.

The favours of our benificent Saviour were at the least contiguous. No sooner hath hee raised the centurion's servant from his bed, then hee raises the widowe's son from his beere.—Bp. Hall. Cont. The Widowe's Sonne Raised.

The suspicious houses, as if afraid to be infected with more misery than they have already, by contiguousness to others, keep off at a distance, having many waste places betwixt them.—Fuller. Holy War, p. 276.

The earth also by being contiguate, and mixt with waters (participating the same divine virtue) brought forth the herb that seedeth seed, &c.
Raleigh. History of the World, b. i. c. i. s. 7.

Neither is it possible that it should be so, considering that the two extremities are contiguate, yea and continuate.
Holland. Plutarch, p. 817.

——— Th' Herefordian plant
Caresses freely the contiguous peach,
Hazel, and weight resisting palm, and likes
T' approach the quince, and the elder's pithy stem.
J. Philips. Cider, b. i.

Thus disembroil'd, they take their proper place
The next of kin contiguously embrace:
And foes are sundered by a larger space.
Dryden. Ovid. Metam. b. i.

Does it [matter] always act by being really and substantially present to the thing acted on? And how can it be really and substantially present to any thing, but by the contiguity of its parts.—Law. Enquiry, c. 3.

But the fancy is determined by habit to pass from the idea of fire to that of melted lead, on account of our having always perceived them contiguous and successive: and this is the whole matter.—Beattie. Essay on Truth, pt. ii. c. 2. s. 3.

To me there appear to be only three principles of connection among ideas, namely resemblance, contiguity in time or place, and cause or effect.
Hume. On Human Understanding, s. 3.

CONTI'NGENT, n.
CONTI'NGENTLY.
CONTI'NGENCE.
CONTI'NGENCY.

Fr. Contingent; It. and Sp. Contingente; Lat. Contingens, prés. part. of Conting-ere; con, and tangere, to touch. (See CONTACT.) Gr. Θιγ-ειν, θιγγαν-ειν, to touch.

Touching upon, reaching or adjoining to, falling together with, happening in connexion with, incidental, casual, fortuitous, falling to the lot, or share of.

God forbid that nise vnthrift! thought shoulde come in thy mynde thy wittes to trouble, sithen euery thynge in commynge is contingent.—Chaucer. Testament of Loue, b. i.

We see, indeed many things to be, and to come to pass, which seem to be contingent, or without any end at all.
Grew. Cosmo. Sacra, b iii. c. 2.

Perhaps the beauty of the world requireth, (though we know it not) that some agents should work without deliberation (which his lordship calls necessary agents) and some agents with deliberation, (and those both he and I call free agents,) and that some agents should work, and we not know how (and their effect we call contingents)
Hobbs. Liberty & Necessity.

And first, the being of prophesies, supposes the non-being of contingents. That is to say, that albeit there are many things, which seem unto us to be contingents, yet were they so indeed, there could have been no prophecy; but only predictions, which were contingently true or false.
Grew. Cosmo. Sacra, b. iv. c. 6.

Presuming perhaps upon like kindness, as we read of 'twixt the Trojans and Romans, in their wars with Antiochus (which was loving respect through contingence of blood) upon like cause remembered to them by tradition.
Drayton. Poly Olbion, s. 1. Selden's Notes.

What is therefore delivered in favour thereof, by authors ancient or modern, must have its root in tradition, imposture, far derived similitude, or casual and rare contingency.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. ii. c. 6

It is certain he must not mean that it is in his own nature venial, but damnable as any other: but it is venial, that is, prepared for pardon upon other contingencies and causes, of which I shall afterwards account.
Bp. Taylor. On Repentance, c. 3. s. 3

Yet it would puzzle the greatest philosopher that ever was, to give any tolerable account, how any knowledge whatsoever can certainly and infallibly foresee an event through uncertain and contingent causes.—Tillotson, S. 48.

Hypothetical necessity is that, which the supposition or hypothesis of God's foresight and pre-ordination lays upon future contingents.—Clarke. Mr. Leibnitz's Fifth Paper.

For as Aristotle says, we are not to expect demonstrations in ethicks, in politicks, nor to build certain rules upon the contingency of human actions.—South, vol. i. Ser. 1

No theatrick audience in Athens would bear what has been borne, in the midst of the real tragedy of this triumphal day; a principal actor weighing, as it were in scales hung up in a shop of horrours,—so much actual crime against so much contingent advantage, and after putting in and out weights, declaring that the balance was on the side of the advantages.—Burke. On the French Revolution.

Mr. Hume allows, that, on the principles of those who deny liberty and contingence, it is impossible for natural reason to vindicate the divine character.
Beattie. On Truth, pt. ii. c. 2. s. 3.

Long may the beauteous fabric rise,
Unite all hearts and charm all eyes,
Above contingency and time,
Stable as earth, as heaven sublime.
Blacklock. To Doctor Donaldson.

And thus they are effected so long as this vapour lasteth; but by and by as pleasant and merry as ever they were in their lives, they sing, discourse, and laugh in any good company, upon all occasions, and so by fits it takes them now and then, except the maladie be inveterate, and then 'tis more frequent, vehement, and continuate.
Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 203.

Now this swiftness of motion will cause so great a difference betwixt them, that one of these little streams may spend more water in the fall, than a stream six times bigger in the ascent, though we should suppose both of them to be continuate.—Wilkins. Dædalus, c. 15.

The water ascends gently, and by intermissions, but it fal's continuately, and with force.—Id. Archimedes, c. 15.

Sometimes leaping with great jumps hither and thither, before they [the hares] betake themselves to their rest, that so the contenuateness of the scent may not lead doggs to their form.—Digby. On Bodies, c. 36.

Besides another motive—power doth 'rise
Out of the heart, from whose pure blood doth spring
The vital spirits: which, born in arteries,
Continual motion to all parts do bring.
Davies. Immortality of the Soul, s. 22.

Whil'st in his hand the bolts of death he beares,
Still watching soules the crafty hunter lyes
With inward fancies, and with outward feares,
Whom he may tempt, continually he tryes.
Stirling. Dooms-Day. The Second Houre.

So then though sleep partake not of our devotion, yet this hinders not the continuatness of it.
Hales. Remains. Ser. Luke, xviii. 1.

Have not I lands of faire inheritance,
Deriv'd by right of long contenuance,
To first born males, so list the law to grace
Nature's first fruits in an eternal race?
Bp. Hall, b. ii. Sat. 2.

And it is no wonder, if the continuation and natural composure of the spirits be rest and ease to the soul, that a violent disjoyning and bruising of them, and baring the soul of them, as I may speak, should cause a very harsh and torturous sense in the centre of perception.
More. Immortality of the Soul, b. ii. c. 10.

He [Nicholas] went beyond the sea again, but upon what account I know not, though I am apt to think not upon any design of turning Mahometan, as N. Saunders or rather his continuator Rishton, is pleased to tell us.
Wood. Athenæ Oxon.

Thus you see continuedly, that the property of the number set off the nature of the work of every day, according to those mysteries that the Pythagoreans have observed in them.
More. Philosophick Cabbala, c. 1.

But in all there is a deformity, not only in the motion of the fibres, but also of the principles whereof they consist. Either by a solution of their continuity, as in burning, cutting, contusions, or by any great tendency to that solution, as in convulsions, or straines.
Grew. Cosmo. Sacra, b. ii. c. 2.

[Something] which restores flesh that was lost, consolidates dissolved continuities, incorporates the newly received nourishment, and joins it continuously with the preexistent parts of flesh and bone.—Cudworth. Intel. System, p. 167.

The same dull sights in the same landscape mixt,
Scenes of still life, and points for ever fix'd
A tedious pleasure in the mind bestow,
And pall the sense with one continued show.
Addison. Epilogue to Lansdowne's British Enchanters.

After this he sends prophets in a continual succession for several ages, who do more clearly discover God's will to them.—Sharp. Works, vol. i. Ser. 11.

But, alas! the honey-moon of a new ministry is always of a short continuance in England.
Hoadly. Letters signed Britannicus, Let. 3.

The great wisdom of the divine Creator appears, in that there is pleasure annexed to those actions, that are necessary for the support and preservation of the individuum and the continuation and propagation of the species; and not only so, but pain to the neglect or forbearance of them.
Ray. On the Creation, pt. ii.

Fire will live in it [the vapour of the grotto del Cani] no longer than in water, because it wraps itself in the same manner about the flame, and by its continuity hinders any quantity of air and nitre from coming to its succour.
Addison. Italy.

O memory! thou soul of joy and pain!
Thou actor of our passions o'er again!
Why dost thou aggravate the wretch's woe?
Why add continuous smart to every blow!
Savage. The Bastard.

Contract your sails; life nothing can bestow
By long continuance, but continued woe;
The wretched privilege daily to deplore
The fun'rals of our friends who go before.
Jenyns. Immortality of the Soul, b. i.

Continuatives, on the contrary by a more intimate connection, consolidate sentences into one continuous whole, and are therefore applicable only to subjects, which have an essential coincidence.—Harris. Hermes, b. ii.

The same thing therefore happens here as in strong and healthy bodys, which are debar'd their natural exercise, and confin'd in a narrow space. They are forc'd to use odd gestures and contortions.
Shaftsbury. Wit and Humour, pt. i. s. 4.

Some with erect pagodas vie,
Some nod, like Pisa's tow'r, awry,
Medusa's snakes, with Pallas' crest
Convolv'd, contorted, and compress'd.—Whitehead. Variety.

Perhaps now and then a merry being may place himself in such a situation as to enjoy at once all the varieties of an epidemical disease, or amuse his leisure with the tossings and contortions of every possible pain exhibited together.
Johnson. Review of a Free Enquiry, &c.

CONTRA. Lat. preposition, pro contera, ut supera pro supra, intra pro intera, is much used in composition, to denote opposition, resistance. As contra-natural, contra-position,—remonstrant,—resistance,—vallation, &c. And see COUNTER.

And concerning pitch and tar, and hemp and flax, to be contraband goods during the war with Spain, the secretary held it reasonable, but I differ'd from him therein.
Whitelock. Memoirs, an. 1656

To say nothing of many false helps, and contraband wares of beauty, which are daily vended in this great mart, there is not a maiden gentlewoman, of a good family in any county of South Britain, who has not heard of the virtues of May dew, or is unfurnished with some receipt or other in favour of her complexion.—Spectator, No. 33.

We both are to make use of the articles between France and this state for contraband goods till such time as we can agree of one [treaty] between ourselves.
Sir W. Temple. Letter from Lord Coventry.

What certainly can be expected, when every nation is at liberty to change its usages, to modify its conventions, to emarge the list of articles esteemed contraband of war, till by prohibiting a commerce in corn and Peruvian bark, it suffers millions of innocent persons to perish by famine or by pestilence.—Watson. Anecdotes, vol. ii. p. 382.

Item, yf durynge this amitie, and truce, any of the subiectes of either prince do presume or attempt to aide, helpe, mainteine or serue ani other prince againste any of the saide contractours.—Hall. Rich. III. an. 3.

For although the princes be named, as chiefe contractors in euery treatie and amitie concluded, yet the countries are bounden, and the subiectes shall make recompence, if anye thing be altred wrongfully out of his course.
Grafton. Edw. IV. an. 9

Yet if affliction once her wars begin,
And threat the feebler sense with sword and fire,
The mind contracts herself; and shrinketh in,
And to herself she gladly doth retire.
Davies. Of the Soul of Man.

The value of all things contracted for, is measured by the appetite of the contractors; and therefore the just value is that which they be contented to give.
Hobbs. Leviathan, pt. i. c. 15

When a man transferreth his right upon consideration of reciprocal benefit, this is not free gift, but mutual donation, and is called contract.—Id. De Corpore Politico, pt. i. c. 2.

——— Jupiter, with a contracted brow
Thus answer'd Mars: Thou many minds, inconstant changling thou:
Sit not complaining thus by me; whom most of all the Gods
(Inhabiting the starrie hill) I hate.
Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. v

For such as think that the sense is deceived, for they see contrary events and passions do proceed from the same objects, they pacifie again, and salve this objection, by teaching, that whereas all things be mingled and confounded together, yet nevertheless this is more sortable and fitting to one, and that to another; whereby there is not the contractation and apprehension of one and the same quality.
Holland. Plutarch, p. 909.

——— Unarm'd, they might
Have easy, as spirits, evaded swift
By quick contraction or remove.—Milton. Par. Lost, b. vi.

Many persons, who were persuaded that the law canonical had no longer place in this realm, had contracted marriage within the degrees of consanguinity and affinity, prohibited by law.—Strype. Memorials. Queen Mary, an. 1554.

A pillar of state; pillar is to be pronounced contractedly; as of one syllable, or two short ones.
Bp. Newton. Note on Paradise Lost, b. ii.

The third argument for brevity, or contractedness of speech in prayer, shall be taken from the very nature and condition of the person who prays; which makes it impossible for him to keep up the same fervour and attention in a long prayer, that he may in a short.—South, vol. ii. Ser. 4.

Which membranes are muscular, compounded of straight and circular fibres, for the more effectual contraction of the wind pipe in any strong or violent expiration or coughing.
Ray. On the Creation, pt. ii.

This is but a contraction of the king's mandate to the archbishop. The whole may be found among the collection of records in the History of the Reformation by Bishop Burnett.—Strype. Memorials. Hen. VIII. an. 1543.

The heart, as said, from its contractive cave
On the left side, ejects the bounding wave;
Expioded thus, as splitting channels lead,
Upward it springs, or downward is convey'd.
Blackmore. The Creation, b. vi.

They [the house of peers] debated, "whether there were an original contract between king and people?" and the affirmative was carried fifty-three against forty-six; a proof that the tories were already losing ground. The next question was, "Whether King James had broken that original contract?" and, after a slight opposition, the affirmative prevailed.—Hume. Hist. of England. King James, an. 1689.

And breathing lungs imbibe th' ethereal mass;
Whence, their licentious ducts diation claim,
And open obvious to the welcome stream,
Which silent, through the heart's contractile force,
Expulsive springs its recontinual course.
Brookes. Universal Beauty, b. iv.

CONTRADICTO'RIOUSLY.

Fr. Contre-dire; It. Contraddere; Sp. Contradecir; Lat. Contradicere, dictum, (contrà, and dicere.)

To say or speak the contrary, to affirm or assert in opposition, in negation, (sc.) to what another has said; to deny, to gainsay, to oppose, to refuse.

But if there be any Englishman found, who shall rashly contradict or contemne the composition of the foresayd ambassadours; then the sayd ambassadours are to bring the forenamed Prussian plaintifes before the presence of the king's maiestie.—Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 152.

The occasion of this errour riseth, for not knowing what is contradiction. Contradiction therefore, is a repugnauncie of one and the same not substaunce onely, nor yet name onely, but of the substaunce, and name both together.
Wilson. The Arte of Logike, fol. 82.

Hath maister Masker cast me downe so depe with prouing me that some merueyled not, where I sayd many did? Be these two propositiõs so sore repugnant and so playn contradictory.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 1109.

But who, alas, can contradict the doome

Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 850.

——— Awake, thou Roman dame,
And entertain my love; else lasting shame
On thee and thine this night I will inflict,
If thou my love's desire do contradict.
Shakespeare. The Rape of Lucrece.

He commanded them all in publike, to renew the said sentence against all contradictors of the sayd charter, so that if he himselfe, through any conceived rancour, had not peradventure observed it, he might more grievously relapse into the sad denounced sentence.
Prynne. The Soveraigne Power of Parliaments, pt. ii. p. 36.

That which taketh away the reputation of wisdom, in him that formeth a religion, or addeth to it, when it is already formed, is the enjoining of a belief of contradictories: for both parts of a contradiction cannot possibly be true: and therefore to enjoin the belief of them, is an argument of ignorance.—Hobbs. Leviathan, pt. i. c. 12.

We have tryed already, and miserably felt what ambition, worldly glory, and immoderate wealth can do, what the boisterous and contradictional hand of a temporal, earthly, and corporeal spirituality can avail to the edifying of Christ's holy church.—Milton. Of Reformation, b. ii.

All which is no more, than is generally acknowledged by theologers, when they affirm that God Almighty himself cannot do things contradictious; there being no other reason for this assertion, but only this, because contradictiousness is repugnant to conception.—Cudworth. Intel. Syst. p. 719.

It is not possible to perform a worship without some natural or instituted ceremony, and while they are not contradictive to the canon, I cannot think, God will be angry with me for obeying them.—Feltham, pt. ii. Res. 73.

Beza would seem to shun the contradictory, by telling us that the Lord spake it not in person as he did the former precept.—Milton. Tetrachordon.

And what if they in their contradictory opinions pretend both to relie upon the truth of God, doth this make their contradictions ever a whit the more repugnant?
Chillingworth. Rel. of Prot. c. 4. pt. i.

Moreover, such as have naturally discoursed hereon, have so diversly, contrarily, or contradictorily delivered themselves, that no affirmative from thence can reasonably be deduced.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iii. c. 12.

This is therefore a contradictorious humour in you to decry the parliament in 1649, that you may extoll the parliament in 1641.
State Trials. Lieut. Col. J. Lilburne, an. 1649.

One soul in both doth thus philosophize,
Concludes at once contradictoriously
To her own self.—More. On the Soul, pt. iii. s. 14. p. 38.

We must ask them, Whether natural religion speaks so plainly in any one point of religion, but that some perverse man or other has contradicted it?—Atterbury, vol. iii. Ser. 2.

All the injuries, reproaches, false accusations, all the cruelties, indignities, and violence, which were offered him, from the time of his publick appearance to his expiring upon the cross, being undergone by him, by the malice of unreasonable men, may be called the contradiction of sinners: for the sense of this word extends as well to actions as words.—Stillingfleet, vol. i. Ser. 6.

What is the result of these doctrines, but the necessary introducing of Atheism, and the banishing religion from among men. It being upon these principles, not only a needless, impertinent, but an absurd contradictious thing.
Sharp. Works, vol. ii. Ser. 1.

If a gentleman happen to be a little more sincere in his representations, besides being looked on as not well affected, he is sure to have a dozen contradictors at his elbow.—Swift. A Short View of the State of Ireland.

Whosoever in any case acts contradictorily to the person he sustains, or unsuitably to the profession he makes, doth act absurdly and ridiculously; for he destroys the propriety, and confounds the relation of things.
Sharp, vol. vi. Ser. 9.

(The two contradictories of acting and not acting, being always necessarily before him) [a free agent] he must of necessity, and essentially to his being a free agent, perpetually will one of these two things, either to act or to forbear acting.—Clarke. On the Attributes, Prop. 10.

Or since the pulpit is a sacred place,
Where none dare contradict you to your face,
Will you presume to tell a thousand lies?
If so, we may forgive, but must despise.
Dodsley. Art of Preaching.

We state our experience, and then we come to a manly resolution of acting in contradiction to it.
Burke. On a Regicide Peace, Let. 2.

[He] who cannot arrange his own thoughts with precision, who is perpetually recoiling from the very line, which he has prescribed to his own motions, and confounding himself by the contradictoriness of his own ideas.
Whitaker. On Gibbon, c. 60.

CONTRADISTI'NGUISH, v.
CONTRADISTI'NCT, adj.
CONTRADISTI'NCTION.
CONTRADISTI'NCTIVE.

Lat. Contrà, and distinguere, distinctum. See To DISTINGUISH.

To fix a mark or note, marks or notes, so that the difference or opposition of qualities may be evident; to show or declare the notes or marks of opposite qualities; to show or declare the opposite qualities themselves.

Calvin himself, and Chamier, and Moulin, (and who not?) do every where contra-distinguish their pastors to their ruling elders.—Bp. Hall. Episcopacy by Divine Right, pt. iii. s. 2.

And further, he, in his speech, useth it as a contra-distinct term to house or family, of which he had said before into what house ye enter, so now into what city.
Goodwin. Works, vol. iv. pt. iv. p. 81.

If the wisdom of this world, and of the princes of this world, be to be understood of the wisdom and learning of the world in general, as contra-distinguished to the doctrine of the gospel, then the words are added, to shew what folly it is for them to glory as they do in their teachers.
Locke. On 1 Corinthians, Note.

Our author himself has said enough in his advice to an author, particularly where he treats of the simple style in contra-distinction to the learned, the formal, and methodick.
Shaftsbury. Miscel. Reflect. Misc. 1. c. 3.

In the former part of the verse, he speaks of the law being dead; and here, of its being revived again with a new spirit, in contra-distinction to the oldness of the letter.
Warburton. Remarks. Occas. Reflections, pt. i. Post.

This diversity between the contradistinctive pronouns, and the enclitic, is not unknown even to the English tongue.
Harris. Hermes, b. i. c. 5.

CONTRAHE'NTS, s. Lat. Contrahens, pres. part. of contrahere, (See CONTRACT.) Not an uncommon word in diplomatic documents of the time of Hen. VIII.

Contracting, covenanting, agreeing.

For the resistance whereof the king's highness was compelled after the universal peace, by the great study, labour, and travel of his grace conduced, and the same by some of the contrahents newly violate and infringed; in shewing the form of the treatise thereupon made, again to take armour.
Burnet. Rec. Act 26. Hen. VIII. an. 21.

And specially now of late upon the treatise concluded at London, betwixt the king's highness the emperour, and the French king, as princes contrahents.
Strype. Rec. No. 12. Instructions by the King.

The mentioning of a seal here, implies a bill of contract; for bills of contract had their seals appendant to them: each side whereof had his motto, the one suiting with the one party contrahent, the other with the other.
Aleds. Works, b. i. Dis. 22.

CONTRAINDICATE, v.
CONTRAI'NDICANT.
CONTRAINDICA'TION.

Lat. Contrà, indicare, (in, and dicare.) Indicare quasi dicendo significare, vel denunciare; to signify, declare or denote by speech. And, generally,—

To signify or designate, to point out, to give, show, or be a sign, note, mark, or token, contrary to, forbidding or prohibiting, (sc.) in diseases, some usual or peculiar manner of treatment.

Vomits have their use in this malady; but the age and sex of the patient, or other urgent or contraindicating symptoms must be observed.—Harvey. On Consumptions.

I endeavour to give the most simple idea of the distemper, and the proper diet, abstracting from the complications of the first, or the contraindications to the second.
Arbuthnot. On Aliments.

Throughout it was full of contraindicants.—Burke.

CONTRANA'TURAL. Lat. Contrà, and natura, from natus, past part. of nasci. See CONNATE.

Against or opposed to nature.

'Tis the perfection of every being to act according to the principle of its own nature, and it is the nature of an arbitrarious principle to act or not, to do or undo, upon no account but its own will and pleasure; to be determined and tied up, either by itself, or from abroad, is violent and contranatural.—Bp. Rust. Discourse on Truth, s. 6.

CONTRAPOSI'TION. It. Contrapposizzione; Sp. Contraposicion; Lat. Contrà, and positio, from Ponere, positum, to put or place.

Putting or placing against, in opposition, or contrary to.

A conuersion by contraposition is, whē the former part of the sentēce, is turned into the last rehearsed part, and the last rehearsed part, turned into the former part of the sentēce, both the propositions being uniuersall, and affirmatiue, sauing that in the second propositiō, there be certaine negatiues enterlaced.—Wilson. Arte of Logike, fol. 21.

CONTRAPU'NTIST. One skilled in counterpoint, which Cotgrave calls, "A ground or plain song in musick."

Counterpoint is certainly so much an art, that to be what they call, a learned contrapuntist, is with harmonists a title of no small excellence.—Mason. On Church Musick, p. 209.

CONTRA-REGULA'RITY. Lat. Contrà, and regula, a rule, from Reg-ere, to rule.

Opposition or contrariety to rule or order.

It is not only its not promoting, but its opposing, or at least its natural aptness to oppose the greatest and best ends: so that it is not so properly an irregularity as a contra-regularity.—Norris.

CONTRA-REMO'NSTRANT. Lat. Contrà, re, and monstrans, pres. part. of monstrare, (from monere,) to show. Fr. Remonstrer,—to warn, admonish again: to advise a reconsideration.

One who remonstrates, in opposition or answer to a remonstrant.

As for their plea, that they came to defend their opinion no otherwise then the contra-remonstrants did for theirs, it was replyed, first that they did the synod wrong to make this distinction of contra-remonstrants and remonstrants; for in the synod there was no contra-remonstrant, and no man was call'd thither under that name, whereas they in their letters came under the name of remonstrants.

Hales. To Sir D. Carlton, (1618.)

CONTRA-ROTA'TION. Lat. Contrà, and rota, a wheel; which Vossius thinks is from ῥοθεω, cum impetu ferri, to be forced or carried along, to be whirled around.

Some have thought, that, by the contrariety of the strophé and antistrophé, they intended to represent the contrarotation of the primum mobile, in respect of the secunda mobilia; and that, by their standing still at the epode, they meant to signify the stability of the earth.

Our country law contrárí'd that desire,
To which our loves so wholly did incline.

Harrington. Orlando, b xiii. s. 9.

But if the body's death the soul should kill,
Then death must needs against her nature be;
And were it so, all souls would fly it still,
For nature hates and shuns her contrary

Davies. Immortality of the Soul, s. 30.

——— But I in none of these
Find place or refuge; and the more I see
Pleasures about me, so much more I feel
Torment within me, as from the hateful siege
Of contraries.—Milton. Paradise Lost, b. ix.

And indeed if man would consider things upon their true grounds, the church of Rome should be more reproved upon doctrines that infer ill life, then upon such as are contrariant to faith.—Bp. Taylor. Liberty of Prophesying, s 20.

I am sure, there is no more contrariety to any of the Divine attributes in this supposition, then there is in that, which makes God to have sent a pure spirit, which he had just made, into such a body.

Glanvill. Pre-existence of Souls, c. 5.

When every man wept and cried out for sorrow, which could not help, and that all the world was so troubled that there was no order taken for any thing: he [Fabius] contrarily went alone up and down the city very modestly, with a bold constant countenance, speaking courteously to every one, and did appease their womanish cries and lamentations.—North. Plutarch, p. 158.

God of our fathers, what is man!
That thou towards him with hand so various,
Or might I say contrarious,

In friendly contrariety,
How passion's well accorded strife
Gives all the harmony of life.—Johnson. To Miss • • • •

Till it be allowed there was design in our production, it can never be shown that one appetite is righter than another, though they be contrarious and inconsistent.

Warburton. The Divine Legation, b. i. c. 4.

CO'NTRAST, v. } Fr. Contraster; It. Con-
CO'NTRAST, n. } trastare; Sp. Contrastar. Either from the Fr. Contr'estre, or the Lat. Contrà, and stare, (Junius.) Cotgrave has both Contraster, and Contr'estre, with little variation in the explanation: the former,—to strive, withstand, contend against; the latter.—to withstand, resist, contend with; to repugne. In English, to contrast, is—

To be or cause to be, to put or place in opposition; so that the dissimilarity or unlikeness may be the more clearly or distinctly seen.

Du Fresnoy tells us, "That the figures of the groups must not be all on a side, that is with their face and bodies all turned the same way; but must contrast each other by their several positions."

Dryden. A Parallel of Poetry & Painting.

This mixture of so various, and seemingly opposite qualities, which constituted the foregoing contrast, did not proceed from any variation in his temper; but wholly in that of those among whom he conversed.

Law. Life & Character of Christ.

Should we the portrait with the sex compare,
'Twould add new honours to the northern fair;
Their merit, by the foil, conspicuous made,
And they seen brighter from contrasting shade.

Cunningham. A Prologue to Rule a Wife.

Mr. Collins; a writer, whose dexterity in the arts of controversy was so remarkably contrasted by his abilities in reasoning and literature, as to be ever putting one in mind of what travellers tell us of the genius of the proper Indians, who although the veriest bunglers in all the fine arts of manual operation, yet excell every body in slight of hand and the delusive feats of activity.

Warburton. The Divine Legation, b. vi. s. 6.

Contrast to figure, motion, life and light,
There may'st thou vent thy spite:
For ever cursing, and for ever curs'd,
Of all th' infernal crew the worst.

Smart. On Ill Nature, Ode 6.

CONTRATE'NOR. Fr. Contretenеur. The tenor in singing is so called, says Minshew, a tenendâ cantilenâ. Contra-tenor is against or above the tenor.

In his [Dr. Croft's] time there was a very fine contratenor in the Royal Chapel, called Elford, to whom, in the preface to his anthems, he gives great, and I suppose deserved applause, and for whose voice he purposely set several solos.

Mason. On Church Musick, p. 136.

CONTRAVALLA'TION. Lat. Contrà, and vallum, i. e. a fortification, composed ex vallis, of stakes. See CIRCUMVALLATION.

A fortification against or opposed to the assailants.

It is reported concerning the late Czar of Muscovy, that when he first acquainted himself with mathematical learning, he practised all the rules of circumvallation and contravallation, at the siege of a town in Livonia: and by the length of those formalities he lost the opportunity of taking the town.—Watts. Logic, pt. ii. c. 2.

CONTRAVE'NE, v. } Fr. Contrevenir; It

CONTRAVE'NTION. } venire, (contrà, and venire;) to come against, contrary or in opposition to.

To oppose, to hinder, to obstruct.

With certification of those that contravened, that they should be called and severely punished as seditious persons and wilful contemners of his majestie's most just and lawful government.—Spotswood. Church of Scotland, an 1605 b. vi.

The course of all his majesty's life and reign hath manifested how unwilling he hath ever been to use the severity of the laws against those who have said and heard mass, and otherwise contravened the acts of parliament made against idolatrous papistry, and practisers thereof within this kingdom.—State Trials. John Ogilvie, an. 1615.

If the consequential impugning of the authority of the estates of parliament by contravening of its acts of parliament, should fall under the compass of the said act 1584, treason should be too frequent, in regard the contravener of any act of parliament does in consequence impugn the authority of the estates.—Id. Sir Robert Spotswood, an. 1645.

The contravening of an act of parliament, or the accepting of an office not conform to an act of parliament, is not a direct impugning of the authority of the estates of parliament, but a null act.—Id. Ib.

They shall voluntarily accept the condition and fulmination of the said censures in case of contravention.
Lord Herbert. Hist. of Hen. VIII. p. 191.

My argument is, that [to kill one's self] is plainly repugnant to the will of God, and the schemes of his Providence; it is to contravene, to thwart, and overthrow, what in us lies, his manifest purposes; and as such it cannot but be highly affronting to him.
Hoadly. Letters signed Britannicus, &c. Let. 94.

Laws that place the subjects in such a state, contravene the first principles of the compact of authority: they exact obedience, and yield no protection.
Johnson. Journey to the Western Islands.

CONTRA-VE'RSION. Lat. Contrà, and vertere, versum, to turn. See CONTROVERSE.

A turning in opposition or contrariety to another turn.

The second stanza was called the antistrophé, from the contraversion of the chorus; the singers, in performing that, turning from the left hand to the right contrary always to their motion in the strophé.
Congreve. Discourse on the Pindaric Ode.

CONTRE'MBLING. Lat. Con, and trembling, from the Lat. tremere, to quake, shake, or shiver.

Shaking together.

And from all grounds the scyle contrembling shook, than lofty ayre.
Than winds layd down their noyse, and calme sea surges setled faire.—Phaer. Virgill. Æneidos, b. x. p. 227.

CONTRI'BUTE, v. CONTRIBU'TION. CONTRI'BUTIVE. CONTRI'BUT-ER, -OR. CONTRI'BUTORY, adj. CONTRI'BUTORY, s. } Fr. Contribuer; It. Contribuire; Sp. Contribuir; Lat. Contribuere, utum, to give or pay together; (it imports, says Minshew, a pluralitie of givers or gifts,) con, and tribuere, utum, from tribus, tribute, the money paid in the tribes at Rome, according or in proportion to the value of the estate of each person. See TRIBUTE. And thus, to contribute is,—

To give or pay a portion towards one whole; to give or bestow or supply a share or part; to have or bear a part, portion or share, towards some common purpose, design, or effect.

Item, That it may please the king's majesty, for the defence of the league, and cause of religion, to contribute and put in, and under sureties deposit, with the said princes, 100,000 crownes.
Strype. Records, No. 64. Prop. of the Duke of Saxony.

Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 7.

And furthere, ouere and aboue thys that they haue in the countrey: I vnderstande that certayn barbarous or estrangers, be contrybutours vnto the Syracusians.
Nicoll. Thucydides, fol. 155.

This woman besyde her variable garments, hath also taken vpon her (for to set furth her pryde, dignitie, and estimacion withall) to rule ouer all Christien kynges and princes, whiche she hath brought vnder her, and made subject and contributorys vnto her with falsehede and lyes, vtterly against the doctrine of the holy gospell.—Udal. Rev. c. 16.

To assess every one of them to be contributories according to their goods and landa, towards the building of two fortresses.—Strype. Memorials. Commission dated May, 1551.

For such vast room in nature unpossest
By living soule, desert and desolate,
Onely to shine, yet scarce to contribute
Each orb a glimps of light, convey'd so farr
Down to this habitable, which returnes
Light back to them, is obvious to dispute.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. viii.

Hence it was, that the noble Valerius Publicola was buried by a contribution of money gathered for him.
Holland. Ammianus, p. 11.

The same phrases he used to his patients; and seeing conceit is very contributive to the well working of physick, their fancy, or faith natural, was much advanced by his elevated expressions.—Fuller. Worthies. Kent.

He himself ordained, that those houses which had paid tribute before unto the King of Creta, should now yearly thenceforth become contributaries towards the charges of a solemn sacrifice, which should be done in the honour of him.
North. Plutarch, p. 9.

So will it fully convince all foreign princes, that the advice or intention of your majesty were no way contributory to this prodigious violence, whatever inflam'd your ministers and officers to promote it.
Milton. Cromwell to Lewis King of France.

Quoth she, I grant it is in vain
For one that's basted to feel pain,
Because the pange his bones endure,
Contribute nothing to the cure.—Hudibras, pt. ii. c. 1.

We are here so many brethren met together to rejoice and do good; and to do good not only by increasing our friendship and mutual correspondence, but by joining together in a cheerful contribution to those our countrymen that need our charity.—Sharp, vol. i. Ser. 3.

Art thou a true lover of thy country? zealous for its religious and civil interests? and a cheerful contributer to all those public expenses which have been thought necessary to secure them, against the attempts of the common enemy and oppressor?—Atterbury, vol. ii. Ser. 7.

They put all that was bought of one kind, as plantains, or cocoa-nuts, together, and when we had agreed for the heap, they divided the money that was paid for it, among those of whose separate property it consisted, in a proportion corresponding with their contributions.
Cook. Voyage, vol. ii. b. ii. c. 13.

Let therefore the next friendly contributor, whosoever he be, observe the cautions of Swift, and write secretly in his own chamber, without communicating his design to his nearest friend, for the nearest friend will be pleased with an opportunity of laughing.—Rambler, No. 56.

CONTRI'STATE, v. CONTRISTA'TION. } Fr. Contrister; It. Contristare; Sp. Contristar; Lat. Contristare, atum; con, and tristis, which Vossius has no doubt is from Gr. Τρεστης, which Hesychius explains δειλος, i. e. timidus, from τρε-ειν, tremere, to tremble.

To trouble, to afflict, to distress.

But blacknesse, and darknesse, are indeed but privations: and therefore have little or no activity. Somewhat they doe contristate, but very little.—Bacon. Nat. Hist. s. 873.

Incense, and nidorous smells (such as were at sacrifices) were thought to intoxicate the brain, and to dispose men to devotion: which they may do by a kind of sadness and contristation of spirits; and partly also by heating, and exalting them.—Id. Ib. s. 932.

CO'NTRITE. CONTRI'TION. } Fr. Contrit; It. and Sp. Contrito; Lat. Conterere, tritum; con, and terere, to bruise, or crush. (See ATTRITION, from which Contrition is distinguished by school divines; and see, infra, the quotations from Bps. Taylor and Horne.) Gr. Τερ-ειν, perforare, (Vossius.) From Τερ-ειν, comes τριβ-ειν, and the compound συντριβειν, conterere. Συντριβεσθαι, conteri—to be crushed. It is particularly and most emphatically used in the Holy Scriptures.—Συντετριμμενους την καρδιαν, the broken-hearted. Vulgate, Contritos corde, (Luke, iv. 8;) and also by the Septuagint translators. Brown uses contrition literally. See CONTRIVE, infra.

Bruised, crushed, broken, broken-hearted, broken or subdued in spirit: (sc.) oppressed or overpowered by a sense of sin or guilt; and thus, penitent or repentant. See the quotation from Chaucer.

Ac free wil & free wit, folweth a man evere
To repenten and ryse, and rowen out of synne
To contrition, to confession, till he come to hus ende.
Piers Ploughman, p. 168.

He sente me to preche to pore men to heele contryt men in herte.—Wiclif. Luc, c. 4.

In this penance or contrition man shal understond foure thingis: that is to say, what is contrition; and which ben the causes that moven a man to contrition; and how he shuld be contrite; and what contrition availeth to the soule. Then is it thus, that contrition is the veray sorwe that a man receiveth in his herte for his sinnes, with sad purpos to shriven him, and to do penance, and never more done sinne.—Chaucer. The Persones Tale.

And with that worde I gan downe fall
On knees with good deuocion
And with full great contricion
I said than Gower. Con. A. b. i.

More shall thy pennytent sighes his endles mercy please
Then their importune suits, which dreame, that words God's wrath appease;
For hart contrite of fault, is gladsome recompence;
And praier fruict of faith, wherby God doth with synne dispense Surrey. Ecclesiastes, c. 5.

As for the sacrament of penaunce, I beleue that it is needfull to all them that shall be saued, to forsake theyr sinne, and to do penaunce for it wyth true contricion to God, confession of their fautes, and dewe satisfactyon in Christe, lyke as God's lawe limiteth and teacheth, else can they haue no saluation.—State Trials. Sir J. Oldcastle, an. 1413.

He that is attrite leaves his sin; but he that is contrite obeys God, and pursues the interests and acquists of vertue: so that contrition is not only a sorrow for having offended God, whom the penitent loves; that is but one act or effect of contrition, but contrition loves God and hates sin, it leaves this, and adheres to him, abstains from evil and does good; dies to sin and lives to righteousness, and is a state of pardon and acceptable services.
Bp. Taylor. On Repentance, c. 10 s. 3

[Chrystal] is not only triturable, and reduceable into powder, by contrition, but will subsist in a violent fire and endure a vitrification.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. ii. c. 1.

The prophets exhorted sinners in general to return to God, and declared that a broken and contrite heart God would not reject nor despise, even where no sacrifices had been appointed, or would be accepted by him. But that repentance shall open a way for us to eternal life, is clearly taught only in the gospel.—Jortin. On the Christ. Relig. Dis. 7.

If the sorrow arise merely from the fear of punishment, it is called in the language of the schools attrition, and is deemed the lowest and least honourable species of repentance; if from a desire to please God, and a tender sense of having offended so good a father, it is stiled contrition, and is of a more generous and noble kind.
Bp. Horne. Works, vol. v. Dis. 16.

Ford. Perkin Warbeck, Act i. sc. 3

This deliberate walking in the wayes, and with the companions and contrivers of ungodliness, this partaking and prosecutting of the counsels; the enjoying this familiarity with sin proves a strong engagement to continue and preserve, and delight in its acquaintance.
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 677.

[This] was taken by many as a presage that his glorious memory, fame, and posterity, should recover and continue, maugre all the designs and contrivements of his and their implacable enemies.—Baker. Charles II. an. 1650.

The story of the world and of the creation of it, what a glorious contrivement was it, taken simply alone in itself, and how wonderfully did these visible things shew forth the invisible things of God.—Goodwin. Works, vol ii pt.iii. p.83.

It is an old guise of the Devil, to impute the cause of God's people's sufferings, to be contrivements against the state, when in truth it is their religion and conscience they are persecuted for.—State Trials. Christian Love, an. 1651.

They are the Autumn fruits, that we must thrive and live by; the sage sayings, the rare examples, the noble enterprises, the handsome contrivances, the success of good and bad actions, the elevations of the Deity, the motives and incitements to vertue, and the like; are those that must build us up to the gallantry and perfection of man.
Feltham, pt. ii. Res. 27.

These things considered together, it will hence appear, how a perpetual motion may seem easily contrivable.
Wilkins. Dædalus, c. 15.

Ineffable, all pow'rfull God, all free

While no man seeketh to reflect the wrong,
And curb the raunge of his misruly tongue?
Bp. Hall, b. vi. Sat. 1.

At court she [the Lady Mary] alighted, and Mr. Wyngfield, comptroller of the king's house, and many lords and knights brought her through the hall into the chamber of presence: and there she tarried two hours, being treated at a goodly banquet.—Strype. Memorials, an. 1550.

The savage, though she saw her plea controll'd
Yet would not wholly seem to quit her hold,
But offer'd fairly to compound the strife,
And judge conversion by the convert's life.
Dryden. Hind & Panther.

For some, and those the acutest of them, have left unto us many things of falsity, controulable, not only by critical and collective reason, but common and country observation.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. i. c. 6.

Such a strange, sacred, and inviolable majesty has God imprinted upon this faculty; not, indeed, as upon an absolute independent sovereign; but yet with so great a communication of something next to sovereignty, that while it keeps within its proper compass, it is controllable by no mortal power upon earth.—South, vol. ii Ser. 12.

If poverty be my upbraided crime,
And you believe in heaven—there was a time
When he the great controller of our fate,
Deign'd to be man, and liv'd in low estate.
Dryden. The Wife of Bath's Tale.

If the seeds of piety and virtue be but carefully sown at first, very much may be done by this means, even in the most depraved natures towards the altering and changing of them; however, to the checking and controuling of our vicious inclinations.—Tillotson, vol. i Ser. 28.

It is to suppose custom instantaneously controllable by reason, and to endeavour to communicate, by precept, that which only time and habit can bestow.—Rambler, No. 159.

Happy the bard (though few such bards we find)
Who 'bove controlment, dares to speak his mind;
Dares unabash'd in every place appear,
And nothing fears, but what he ought to fear.
Churchill. Independence.

CO'NTROVERSE, v. Fr. Controverse, It. Controversia; Sp. Controverter, controversia; Lat. Controversus; (controvertor parùm Latinum est. Vossius.) Contrà, and vertere, versum, to turn. See CONTRAVERSION.

To turn against, (met.) in dispute or debate, in strife, in litigation; and thus, to dispute, or debate, to strive, to litigate.

The common verb now is, to controvert, (not written as it should be, contravert.)

About ye feest of Mary Magdaleyne, in ye moneth of Julii, controversy and varyaūce began to aryse amonge ye personys assygned for the iii. astatys.—Fabyan. King John, an. 7.

For which cause he desired no innovation should be made on things had been so long in controversy by handstrokes, but rather by commissioners' talk.
Burnet. Records. King Edward's Journal.

Neither wish wee that men should do any thing which in their hearts they are persuaded they ought not to doe; but this perswasion ought (we say) to be fully settled in their hearts, that in litidious [litigious] and controuersed causes of such quality, the will of God is to haue them to doe whatsoeuer the sentence of judiciall and finall decision shall determine, yea, though it seem, in the private opinion, to swarue vtterly from that which is right.—Hooker, Pref. p. 28.

What hope have we to know ourselves, when we Know not the least things, which for our use be?
We see in authors, too stiff to recant,
An hundred controverses of an ant.
Donne. Of the Progress of the Soul.

The Temple of Janus, with his two controversal faces, might now not unsignificantly be set open.
Milton. Liberty of Unlicensed Printing.

And the signs of two opinions contradictory one to another, namely affirmation and negation of the same thing, is called controversy: but both affirmations, or both negations, consent in opinion.—Hobbs. Human Nature, c. 13.

And these in these things I understand for the doctrine of our church: which are so well vindicated by men so infinitely above my abilities as in my reason I am so well satisfied, as I desire not to be further controversial.
Feltham. On the Low Countries.

Yet they who were trusted during the interreign did, by their mediation work them to a compromise, and to remit the decision of the controversion to King Edward I. of England, a prince of long experience, and much respected in that time.—Spotswood. Church of Scotland, b. ii. an. 1279.

In which place (boulted before to the bran by many controverters) mine adversarie hath learned of his Bellarmine, to triumph above measure.
Bp. Hall. The Honour of the Maried Clergie.

Sine Dei gratia, Nulla possunt esse liberi arbitrii bona merita, saith the controversor.
Mountagu. Appeale to Cæsar, p. 91.

But whichsoever of these two sisters have prerogative of primogeniture (a matter too much controverted betwixt them) none can give them less attribute, than to be two radiant eyes fixed in this island, as the beauteous face of the earth's body.—Selden. On Drayton's Poly-Olbion, s. 11.

——— Or in divinity
As controverters in vouch'd texts leave out
Shrew'd words, which might against them clear the doubt.
Donne, Sat. 2.

Some controverters in divinity are like swaggerers in the taverne, that catch that which stands next them, the candlesticke, or pots; turne every thing into a weapon; oft times they fight blindfolde; and both beate the ayre.
B. Jonson. Discoveries.

All which, notwithstanding, upon a strict enquiry, we find the matter controvertible, and with much more reason denied then is as yet affirmed.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. ii c. 1.

And made the stoutest yield to mercy

Not by the force of carnal reason,
But indefatigable teazing. Hudibras, pt. iii. c. 2.

Polemical or controversial divinity is theologia armata, or that part of divinity, which instructs and furnisheth a man with necessary weapons to defend the truth against its enemies.—Bp. Bull, vol. i. p. 150. Ser. 6.

This was the great proposition that was then controverted concerning Jesus of Nazareth, whether he was the Messiah or no; and the assent to that, was that which distinguished believers from unbelievers.
Locke. The Reasonableness of Christianity.

Almost every new acquired territory is in some degree controvertible, and till the controversy is decided, a term very difficult to be fixed, all that can be had is real possession and actual dominion.—Johnson. Falkland Islands.

This rash and wild controversialist [Marcion] published a recension or chastised edition of Saint Luke's Gospel, containing the leading facts, and all which is necessary to authenticate the religion.—Paley. Evidences, pt. i. c. 9. s. 7.

What an Aceldama, what a field of blood Sicily has been in ancient times, whilst the mode of its government was controverted between the republican and tyrannical parties, and the possession struggled for by the natives, the Greeks, the Carthaginians, and the Romans, your lordship will easily recollect.—Burke. A Vindication of Natural Society.

What right hath a modern controvertist to require more from a Jew than Justin Martyr required from Trypho?
Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History.

CONTRU'SION. Lat. Contrudere, usum, (con, and trudere,) to thrust, or squeeze together.

The doctor tells us that the cause of the incolumity of the tadpole is, that the pressure or contrusion of the particles of the water against one another is hindered or frustrated by the principium hylarchicum.—Boyle. Works, vol. iii. p. 617.

CONTU'MACY, n. Fr. Contumace; It. and Sp. Contumacia; Lat. Contumacia; so called, a contemnere, quod est super alios aspernari; or rather a tumore, (Voss.) The French have the verb, Contumacer; thus fully explained by Cotgrave:—
CONTU'MACIOUS. CONTUMA'CIOUSLY. CONTUMA'CIOUSNESS.

To deal stubbornly, be perverse, follow his own will; disobey or rebel against his superiors; to make a contempt.

Ne in enquestes to come. ne contumax thaugh he worthe
Piers Ploukmon, p. 219

Hobbs. Behemoth, pt. ii.

Past measure contumeliously, this crew
Fare through thy house.—Chapman. Homer. Odyssey, b. i.

If as I did not make my evidence good, so he did not evince it bad, (which yet certainly he hath not) there could yet be no place for his contumelies, according to his own grounds of the dueness of them, nor consequently for retortion of the charge of contumeliousness on me.

Hammond. Works, vol. ii. p. 173.

The apostles were pinched with all kinds of want, harrassed with all sorts of toil, exposed to all manner of hazards, persecuted with all variety of contumelies, and pains that can be imagined.—Barrow, vol. iii. Ser. 8.

But there are some expositors who understand the word βλασφημοι here in a milder sense, and with reference to men, as it denotes such as by contumelious speeches, maliciously injure the fame and reputation of others, especially their superiors, and those that are in authority over them.

Bp. Bull, vol. ii. Ser. 15.

Nothing aggravates tyranny so much as contumely. Quicquid superbia in contumeliis was charged by a great man of antiquity, as a principal head of offence against the governour general of that day.—Burke. On Mr. Fox's East India Bill.

Yet oft his courtesies are smoother wronge;
Pride brandishes the favours he confers,
And contumelious his humanity.—Young. Compl. Night 3.

It would not signify a pin,
Whatever climate you were in.
Swift. Reason for not Building at Drapier's Hall.

What I pretend by this dedication, is an honour which I do myself to posterity by acquainting them, that I have been conversant with the first persons of the age in which I lived; and thereby perpetuate my prose, when my verses may possibly be forgotten, or obscured by the fame of future poets.—Dryden. Dedication to King Arthur.

So wise and useful was the conversation of him [Haddon] and his fellow, [Martyr,] the king's professor of Oxford, that a man in those days of great fame and learning, and virtue, who was acquainted with them both, called them, "That golden couple of fathers."
Strype. Memorials. Edw. VI. an. 1550.

There oft thou listen'st to the wild uproar
Of fleets encount'ring, that in whispers low
Ascends the rocky summit, where thou dwell'st;
Remote from man, conversing with the spheres.
Warton. Pleasures of Melancholy.

But when the sun deserts the skies,
And the dull winter evenings rise,
Then for the husband's social pow'r
To form the calm, converse hour.—Cotton, Vis. I. Mar.

But conversation, choose what theme you may,
And chiefly when religion leads the way,
Should flow, like waters after summer show'rs,
Not as if rais'd by mere mechanic pow'rs.

To turn together; to turn to or towards another; to turn and transform to some common use; to turn or change to some way of acting or thinking.

B. Jonson uses it as equivalent to translate, (q.) to turn from one language to another.

Therefore be ye repentaunt and be ghe conuertid, that ghour synnes be don awei.—Wiclif. Dedis, c. 3.

And for this miracle, in conclusion,
And by Custance's mediation,
The king and many other in that place,
Converted was, thanked be Criste's grace.
Chaucer. The Man of Lawes Tale, v. 5166.

——— [Constance] was so full of faith,
That the greatest of Barbarie
Of hem, whiche vse marchandie
She hath conuerted, as thei come
To hir vpon a tyme in Rome. Gower. Con. A. b. ii.

——— That pleasaunt taste of ioy
That he endured had in Troy,
From sweetes to sower did conuart
When Cresida did thence depart.
Turbervile. The Louer in vtter Dispaire.

[Howbeit] after this Jeroboam conuerted not frō his wicked way.—Bible, 1583. 1 Kings, xiii. 33.

But lette our couetous conuertors choppe and chaunge bread and wyne till we there feele, see, & taste neither bread nor wine, and then will we beliue them, so they bryng for them the word of God.—Tyndall. Workes, p. 474.

Also by reason of the affinitie, whiche it hath with mylke, it is conuertible into bloude and flesh.
Sir T. Elyot. The Castel of Helth, b. ii.

And after they were brought on their waye by the congregacyon, they passed ouer Phenices and Samaria, declaringe ye conuersyon of the Gentyls, and they broughte greate ioye unto all the bretherē.—Bible, 1551. Acts, c. 15.

Conversion is the changing or altering of words in a proposition, when the former part (whereof any thing is rehearsed) and the hinder parte (which is rehearsed of the former) are chaunged, the one into the other a place.

Wilson. The Arte of Logike, fol. 21.

Wonder not then, what God for you saw good
If I refuse not, but convert as you,
To proper substance. Milton. Paradise Lost, b. v.

O which way shall I first convert myself?

B. Jonson. Cynthia's Revels, Act I. sc. 1.

Which story [Berenice] then presently celebrated by Callimachus, in a most elegant poeme, Catullus more elegantly converted.—Id. The Masque of Queenes.

The chaste shall follow the lamb, and the virgins sing there where the mother of God shall reign; and the zealous converters of soules, and labourers in God's vine-yard, shall worship eternally.—Bp. Taylor, vol. i. Ser. 1.

Nor would I be a convertite so cold,
As not to tell it; if this be too bold,
Pardons are in this market cheaply sold.

Donne. A Letter to the Lady Carey.

Pand It was my breath that blew this tempest vp,
Vpon your stubbourne vsage of the pope.
But since you are a gentle convertite,
My tongue shall hush againe this storme of warre.

Shakespeare. King John, Act v. sc. 1.

So that this convertible retrogradous sorites may shut up all.—Hammond, vol. iv. p. 603.

——— He oft
Frequented their assemblies, wherso met,
Triumphs or festivals; and to them preach'd
Conversion and repentance, as to soule
In prison, under judgments imminent.

Milton. Paradise Lost, b. xi.

The rest, too solid to receive a bent,
Converts to bones; and what was once a vein,
Its former name and nature did retain.—Dryden. Ovid. Met.

Of what other use his mentioning this of Titus here can be, but to shew to the Galatians that what he preach'd contain'd nothing of circumcising the convert Gentiles, it is hard to find.—Locke. Galatians, c. 2. Note 2.

As he is no wise man that doth not fear God, so neither can he be said to fear God that doth not keep his commandments,—fearing God and keeping his commandments being indeed equivalent and convertible terms.

Beveridge, vol. ii. Ser. 99.

So that you may rest upon this as a proposition of an eternal, unfailing faith, that there neither is, nor ever was any person remarkably ungrateful, who was not also unsufferably proud; nor convertibly any one proud, who was not equally ungrateful.—South, vol. i. Ser. 11.

Hence the distance of meridians at two places, measured upon the equator, or the difference of longitude, being known, it is easy to compute how much the hours at one place precede the same hours at the other, by allowing four minutes of time for each degree of that distance; and conversely, the difference of time being given, the difference of longitude is computed by allowing one degree for each four minutes of time, and proportionably in greater or lesser differences.—Maclaurin. Newton. Phil. Dis. b. iii. c. 1.

"Now, whether I should beforehand,
Swear he robb'd me?" "I understand."
"Or bring my action of conversion
And trover for my goods?"—Hudibras, pt. iii. c. 3.

For never yet might any monarch dare,
Who liv'd to truth, and breath'd a Christian air,
Pretend that Christ (who came, we all agree,
To bless his people, and to set them free)
To make a convert ever one law gave,
By which converters made him first a slave.

Churchill. Gotham, b. i.

So that the law, and the opinion of the judge, are not always convertible terms, or one and the same thing; since it sometimes may happen that the judge may mistake the law.—Blackstone. Commentaries, vol. i. Introd. § 3.

By the ancient usages which prevailed in that kingdom, the general circulation of property, and in particular the mutual convertibility of land into money, and of money into land had always been a matter of difficulty.

Burke Reflections on the French Revolution.

It is not true (says he,) but the converse of the proposition is true in the utmost latitude, viz. that they met with molestation from the civil power, because their assemblies were nocturnal.—Warburton. Div. Leg. Pref. to ed. of 1758.

Saint Paul was called miraculously; and by the glorious manifestation of Christ himself, and he was instructed by the same Divine master; such will perhaps be the conversion and illumination of the Jews.

Fr. Convex; It. Convesso; Sp. Convexo; Lat. Convexus, (con, and vehere,) to carry. Convexum est id quod supra concavum convehitur. See CONCAVE.

The exterior of a bowl is the convex or out-bowed side; the interior is the concave. See the quotation from Hall.

The convex or out-bowed side of a vessell will hold nothing: it must be the hollow and depressed part that is capable of any liquor.—Bp. Hall. An Holy Panegyricke.

An I only looking on the moon, might occasion, as it were by a proportion converse, the thought of a burning concave. The moon being a convex, by which the sun-beams are scattered, and the nocturnal air, thereby rendered the more cool.—Grew. Cosmo. Sacra, b. ii. c. 6.

Notwithstanding, to speak strictly, in their natural figure they [dolphins] are straight, nor have their spine convexed, or more considerably embowed then sharks, porposes, whales, and other cetaceous animals.—Brown. Vulg. Err. b. v. c. 2.

For though they be drawn repandous, or convexedly crooked in one piece, yet the dolphin that carrieth Arion is concavously inverted, and hath its spine depressed in another.—Id. Ib

Let it be inquired what is the terme of levitie, for sure their meaning (who made the centre of the earth, the centre of gravitie) is not that the ultimate convexity of heaven should be the stint and limits of levitie.

Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, b. v.

So to the convex glass embody'd run,
Drawn to a point, the glories of the sun;
At once the gathering beams intensely glow,
And through the strengthen d circle fiercely flow.

Pitt. On the King's Return.

She found the polish'd glass, whose small convex
Enlarges to ten millions of degrees
The mute, invisible else, of Nature's hand
Least animal. J. Philips. Cider, b. i.

Who would part with these solid and substantial blessings for the little fantastical pleasantness of a smooth uniform convexity and rotundity of a globe.—Bentley, Ser. 8.

Oh, no. To distant climes, a dreary scene,
Where half the convex world intrudes between,
Through torrid tracts with fainting steps they go,
Where wild Altama murmurs to their woe.

Goldsmith. Deserted Village.

For this daring assertion he made way by the intermediate paragraphs; in which he observes, that the convexity of a semi-ellipsis may be increased at will to any degree that strength may require; which is, that an elliptical arch may be made less elliptical, to be made less weak.

Johnson. Plans for Blackfriars Bridge, Let. 3.

Buckler fleshy above, formed convexly; flat beneath.

Warner. Albion's England, b. v. c. 24.

The godly ill, the wicked good may have,
And both may be whilst here, pleas'd or annoy'd.
But as they are, all make what they receive,
Not reale of itselfe but as imploy'd;
Those temporal treasures monuments do leave,
As by a blessing, or a curse conveyd.

Sterling. Dooms-day. The First Houre.

The day following [Jan. 29, 1645] we were faine to hire a strong convey of about 30 firelocks to guard us through the Cork woods.—Evelyn. Memoirs.

And all this peace and glory shall arise from the subversion of Rome and Antichrist, and his adherents, so evidently described in the 14th, and 18th, and the 19th of the Revelation, that the very Jesuites themselves, Ribera and Vegas, cannot possibly devise any jugling conveyance how to shift it off.—Hakewill. Apologie, p. 475.

That all sheriffs, justices of the peace, &c. within one hundred and fifty miles of York, make stay of all arms and ammunition carrying to York, and apprehend the conveyers.

Whitelock. Memoirs. Charles I. an. 1642.

Had it been so, we should naturally have betaken ourselves to prayer, and breathed out our desires in that form, wherein they are most properly conveyed.

Atterbury, vol. i. Ser. 1.

For, what is become of that tradition? if it be lost, then it follows that tradition is no infallible way of conveyance, and therefore we have no reason to adhear to a written word.

Stillingfleet, vol. iv. Ser. 2.

Honest Coupler the conveniencer [conveyancer] says he can distinguish upon sight of the parties, before they have opened any point of their business, which of the two has the daughter to sell.—Tatler, No. 199.

But that which Mr. Locke, according to his usual modesty, would not determine, was whether "Rest be any more a privation than motion," in those organs of the body which are the immediate conveyers of all our ideas.

Law. Enquiry, c. 1

While evening, veil'd in shadows brown,

And mists in spreading streams convey
More fresh the fumes of new-shorn hay;
Then Goddess, guide my pilgrim feet.

Warton. On the Approach of Summer, Ode II.

Proverbial speeches, before the general use of recording abstract names and things by writing, being the best and safest conveyance of the memory of events to posterity.

Warburton. Divine Legation, b. vi. § 5

CONVI'CIATE, v. }
CONVI'CIOUS. }

Fr. Convicieux; Lat. Convicior, atum, (a voce est, Vossius.) "Convicium seems to be the clamour of many, or of one repeated, as if it were convocium," Gesner.

To clamour, to raise a clamour or outcry; to rail, to revile, to reproach.

I recollected myself and humbly desired of the Lords two things: "One, that they would expect proof, before they gave up their belief to these loud, but loose assertions, especially since it is an easy thing for men so resolved, to convicciate, instead of accusing."

State Trials. Abp. Laud, an. 1640-44.

The queene's majesty commaundeth all maner her subjects to forbeare all vaine contentious disputations in matters of religion, and not to use in despite or rebuke of any person these convicious words,—papist, or papistical, heretike, schismatike, or sacramentarie, or any such like words of reproche.—Queen Elizabeth. Injunctions, &c. an. 1559.

CONVICI'NITY. Lat. Con, and vicinus, from vicus, which Vossius believes is from the Gr. Οικ-ος, a house, home or dwelling-place.

The nearness or neighbourhood.

The bishop having first stated the convicinity and contiguity of the two parishes.—Warton. Hist. of Keddington, p. 18.

Fr. Convaincre; It. Convincere; Sp. Convencer, Lat. Convincere, -ctum, (con, and vinc-ere,) which Vossius thinks may be formed from νικ-αω, by a transposition of the two first letters, and prefixing v. To convince or convict, is—

To subdue, to overpower, to conquer, (lit. and also met. sc.) in argument, and thus, to confute or refute; prove to the satisfaction of another;—also, upon trial; and thus, to prove or find guilty, to adjudge or sentence to be guilty.

Whom he no sooner sawe
(I meane the Thracian prince)
But streight therewith his fancies fume
All reason did convince.

Gascoigne. The Fable of Philomela.

With a texte of Holy Scripture rightly alleged, he convinced the texte of Scripture whiche Satan had falsely cyted, as if one shoulde have dryuen out one nayle with another in a bourde.—Udal. Luke, c. 3.

At this sayde courte these Judeus punyshed sore baylyes and other officers that before hym were convycte for dyuerse trespacys, and specyallye for takynge of mercenamentys otherwise then the lawe them commaundyde.

Fabyan, vol. ii. an. 1258.

Because that of nature we are evil, therefore we both thinke and do evil and are vnder vengeance vnder the law, convict to eternal damnation by the law, and are contrary to the will of God in all our will, and in all thynges consent to the will of the fende.—Tyndall. Workes, p. 380.

You wonder how they that have seen the king set upon his throne, at a session of parliament (sub aureo et serico Cælo, under a golden and silken heaven) under a canopy of state, should so much as make a question whether the majesty resided in him, or in the parliament? They are certainly hard of belief, whom so lucid an argument, coming down from heaven, cannot convince.

Milton. Defence of the People of England, &c.

Others, which is their courtesy, confess that wit and parts may do much to make that seem true, which is not, (as was objected to Socrates by them who could not resist his efficacy, that he ever made the worst cause seem the better,) and thus thinking themselves discharg'd of the difficulty, love not to wade further into the fear of a convincement.

Id. Tetrachordon.

For the Divine Light now was only a convincer of his miscarriages, but administered nothing of the divine love and power, as it does to them that are obedient and sincere followers of its precepts, and therefore Adam could no more endure the presence of it then sore eyes the sun or candle light.—More. Moral Cabbala, c. 3.

Upon what uncertainties, and also convincible falsities they often erected such emblems, we have elsewhere delivered.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iii. c. 9.

But of this I have spoke so fully and convincingly in the second book of my Antidote, that it will be but a needless repetition to proceed any further on this subject.

More. Immortality of the Soul, b. i. c. 12.

When they [passages of Holy Writ] are proposed to us convincingly as such, may not be disbelieved.

Hammond. Works, vol. i. p. 545.

Craving neither gold nor silver, which long agoe we might not have, nor so much as once see; so denied it was us, as if we had been convicted to have undertaken so many tollefull paines and perels even against the state and commonweale.—Holland. Ammianus, p. 91.

Laws were also given for regulating the courts of justice. No man was to be judged convict of any offence, small or great, not of murther, nor of idolatry itself, without two or three witnesses of the fact.—Grew. Cosmo. Sacra, b. iv. c. 8.

Attendance none shall need, nor train, where none
Are to behold the judgment, but the judg'd,
Those two; the third best absent is condemned,
Convict by flight, and rebel to all law.
Conviction to the serpent none belongs

Milton. Paradise Lost, b. x.

And thus we shou'd be disfurnish't of the best and most convincing argument, that we have, to prove that a principle of exactest wisdom hath made and ordered all things.

Glanvill. The Pre-existence of Souls. The fifth Pillar.

When I speak of demonstrating there is a God, I would not be suspected of so much vanity and ostentation, as to be thought I mean to bring no arguments but such as are so convincing that a man's understanding shall be forced to confesse that it is impossible to be otherwise then I have concluded.—More. Antidote against Atheism, c. 2. p. 10

The truth of the gospel had clearly shined in the simplicity thereof, and so convincingly against all the follies and impostures of the former ages.—Id. Expos. Seven Ch. p. 141.

They doubted the truth of his resurrection; and therefore he stayed to give them such convincing proofs, and assurances of it, as might enable them to convince others, and become authentic witnesses of that great matter of fact, upon which, as upon a chief corner stone, the whole frame of his religion is to be founded.—Atterbury, vol. iii. Ser. 7.

Much she reproach'd, and many things she said,
To cure the madness of th' unhappy maid—
In vain: for Myrrha stood convict of ill;
Her reason vanquish'd, but unchang'd her will.

Dryden. Ovid. Metam. Cinyras & Myrrha, b. 10.

Its garrison (being) in great measure unarmed, it was impossible that it could have opposed our force, or that its half-starved inhabitants, most of whom are convicts banished thither from other parts, could have had any other thoughts than that of submitting.

Anson. Voyage round the World, b. ii. c. 14.

And, when a friend in kindness tries
To show you where your error lies,
Conviction does but more incense,
Perverseness is your whole defence.

Swift. To Stella, 1720.

These sort of things are indeed very difficult to express, and not easie to be conceived but by very attentive minds: but to such as can and will attend, nothing (I think) is more demonstrably convincive. Clarke. Answer to the first Letter.

They [wise men] desire to see the several parts of it so far cleared up, and made consistent with each other, and, upon the whole, to discover such evident marks of a superior wisdom, power, and goodness in the frame and texture of it, as may convince them that it is truly divine, and worthy of the Supreme mind, to whom we ascribe it.

Hurd. Works, vol. vi. Ser. 2.

But if the jury find him [the prisoner] guilty, he is then said to be convicted of the crime whereof he is indicted. Which conviction may accrue two ways: either by his confessing the offence and pleading guilty; or by his being found so by the verdict of his country.

Blackstone. Commentaries, b. iv. c. 27.

CONVI'VE, v.
CO'NVIVE, n.
CONVI'VAL.
CONVI'VIAL.
CONVIVIA'LITY.

"This word," says Steevens, "is not peculiar to Shakespeare. I find it several times used in the History of Helyas Knight of the Swanne, b. l. no date."

Lat. Convivere; con, and vivere, to live.

To live together, to feed, to feast together; to provide or partake of a festal, social meal, or compotation, (qv.) See the quotation from Denham.

Aga. First all your peers of Greece go to my tent,
There in full convive you.

Shakespeare. Troil. & Cress. Act iv. sc. 3.

A feast, which though with pleasures complement
The ravish'd convives tongues it courted; yet
Unto the palates of their soule it sent
More courteous salutes.—Beaumont. Psyche, c. 10. s. 211.

And though this may only seem an adventure of northern stomachs, yet as Herodotus tells us, in the better clime of Persia, the same was a convival dish, [horse flesh] and solemnly eaten at the feasts of their nativities.

Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iii. c. 25.

When Questor, to the Gods, in public calls
I was the first who set up festivals.
Not with high tastes our appetites did force,
But fill'd with conversation and discourse,
Which feasts convivial meetings we did name.

Denham. Of Old Age, pt. iii.

While in smooth dance the light-winged Hours
Led round his lyre its patron powers,
Kind laughter and convivial joy.

Akenside, b. i. Ode 13

These extemporaneous entertainments were often productive of greater conviviality than more formal and premeditated invitations.—Malone. Life of Sir Josh. Reynolds, p. 81.

CONVO'KE, v.
CO'NVOCATE, v.
CONVOCA'TION.

Fr. Convocation; It. Convocare, -azione; Sp. Convocacion; Lat. Convocare, to call together; con, and vocare, to call.

To call, to summon together; to convene or assemble by calling.

But even as this primacy, for an order of synods & councils among us, was by man deuised; so was the primacy of Rome by a man ordered & invented at such time as a councel general of al Christian nations was first conuocate and assembled.—Strype. Records, No. 81. Starky to Pole.

At the lawfull denouncement and request of our universall clergy in the seyd conuocation, we proceded against him according to the lawe (God to witnes) with all the fauer possible.—State Trials, an. 1413. Sir John Oldcastle.

And it will not be sufficient to say they were not lawful councils: for they were convened by that authority, which all the world knows did at that time convocate councils.

Bp. Taylor. The Liberty of Prophesying, s. 6.

At this time, the cardinal by his power legatine, dissolved his convocation at Paule, convoked by the Archbishop of Canterbury, calling him and all the clergy to the convocation at Westminster.—Baker. Hen. VIII. an. 1523.

For extraordinary occasions they are convoked by a council called the Gecommitteer de Readen, or the commissioned counsellors, who are properly a council of state of the province, composed of several deputies.

Sir Wm. Temple. On the United Provinces, c. 2.

——— The hall scarce kept awake,
The convocation gap'd, but could not speak.

Pope. The Dunciad, b. iv.

CONVO'LVE, v.
CO'NVOLUTED.
CONVOLU'TION.

Lat. Convolvere, to roll together, (con, and volvere, to roll; A. S. Wealow-ian, Tooke.)

To roll, enfold, or entwine together; to join or unite by rolling together.

——— Then Satan first knew pain
And writh'd him to and fro convolv'd.

Milton. Paradise Lost, b. vi.

Each of these least, and almost invisible glands, consisteth of the same sort of convolved fibres of vessels. Their convolution being contrived, for the better separation of the several parts of the blood.—Grew. Cosmo. Sacra, b. i. c. 5

——— He wreath'd him to and fro
Convolv'd, yet thus distress'd, intrepid bore
His hilts aloft, and guarded well his head.

Somervile. Hobbinol.

CONVO'YING, n.

Fr. Convoyer; It. Convogliare; Sp. Convoyar; is merely to convey. See the quotation from Evelyn in v. CONVEY. As now used—

To accompany in the conveyance; as a guide, protection, or defence; and thus, to conduct, to protect, to guard, to defend.

It was concluded, perceiuing the weknesse of their shippes and the danger of the Englishmen, that they would send their shippes emptie with souldiers to conuey them, either to Sruil or Lisbon, where they could first arriue, with aduice vnto his maiestie of all that had past, and that he would giue order to fetch the siuer with good and safe conroy

Hacluyt. Voyages, vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 181.

Whilst angels him convoy, and saints attend
(The heavens as smoke all fled before his face)
Christ through the clouds with glory doth descend
With majestie and terrour, power and grace

Sterling. Dooms-Day. The Third Houre.

I shall likewise assay those wily arbitresses [i. e. the affections and desires] who in most men have, as was heard, the sole ushering of truth and falsehood between the sense and the soul, with what loyalty they will use me in conveying this truth of my understanding.

Milton. Reason of Church Government.

Laer. My necessaries are imbark't; farewell
And sister, as the winds giue benefit,
And conuoy is assistant; doe not sleepe,
But let me heare from you.—Shakes. Hamlet, Act i. sc. 3.

Therefore, when any favour'd of high Jove
Chances to pass through this advent'rous glade
Swift as the sparkle of a glancing star
I shoot from heav'n, to give him safe convoy.

Milton. Comus.

I aim at the conroying of you up to your Eton.

Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 453.

But now, had not God set a very peculiar value upon the service paid him in his temple, surely he would not have thus (as it were) made himself his people's convoy, and exerted a supernatural work to secure them in their passage to it.—South, vol. i. Ser. 8.

Thus as convoy-ships either accompany or should accompany their merchants till they may prosecute the rest of their voyage without danger, so Philostratus has brought me thus far on my way, and I can now sail on without him.

Dryden. A Parallel of Poetry and Painting.

But if you are more inclined to defer your voyage till your recovery shall be more confirmed, let me entreat you to be very careful in choosing a safe ship; and that you would neither sail at an improper season nor without convoy.

Melmoth. Cicero, b. vi. Let. 17

CONVU'LSE, v.
CONVU'LSION.
CONVU'LSIVE.

Lat. Convellere, vulsum; con, and vellere, to tear.

To tear or rend; to pull or pluck together; to draw together, sharply, violently. Cotgrave calls convulsion—

A plucking up or shrinking of the sinews, as in the cramp. It is also applied to any irregular violent motion; as, to a commotion in the State.

For then, th' unmeasurable earth had not so thicke beene gnawne,
(In death's convulsions) by our friends.

Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. xix.

——— Those two massive pillars
With horrible convulsion to and fro,
He tugg'd, he shook, till down they came and drew
The whole roof after them, with burst of thunder
Upon the heads of all who sat beneath.

Milton. Samson Agonistes.

If a man views himself, in his own imagination, ruined in his fortunes and undone by knaves; struggling to no purpose; conculed and agonizing under the knife of some truculent ruffian, &c.—Wollaston. Religion of Nature, s. 6.

A general shout succeeds, as when on high
Exploded thunder rends the vaulted sky;
A short convulsion shakes the solid shore,
And rocks th' adjacent deep, unmov'd before.
Hughes. The Triumph of Peace.

'Tis said with ease, but, oh, how hardly try'd!
By haughty souls to human honour ty'd!
O sharp convulsive pangs of agonizing pride.
Dryden. Hind & Panther.

First, know my friend, I do not mean
To write a treatise on the Spleen;
Nor to prescribe when nerves convulse;
Nor mind th' alarum watch, your pulse.—Green. The Spleen.

Again when we hear the voice of this Almighty God, in storms—in thunder—in earthquakes, do we stand in awe of that being, in whose hands are all these vast convulsions of nature?—Gilpin, vol. ii. Ser. 26.

An irregular, convulsive movement may be necessary to throw off an irregular convulsive disease.
Burke. On the French Revolution.

Pliny (see the quotation from Holland's Translation) and Varro, (De R. R.) think they are so called, because they are accustomed to make holes for themselves under ground; sub terra cuniculos.

Cony-catch,—to catch conys—simple animals—by gins or snares; and thus, to deceive, to delude, to entrap, (sc.) any simpleton. A society of sharpers (says Archdeacon Nares) was called a warren; and hence also many of their terms were derived. (See Decker's English Villainies; and D'Israeli's Curiosities of Literature, iii. 78.)

Nowe meaning falsely thus, he vseth yet in his speach a foolishe wilinesse, as doth a conye that coureth her hed, and weneth all were well, when all her loynes be open.
Sir T. More. Workes, p. 588.

Ferrets are in great account for chasing and hunting of these connies. The manner is to put them into their earths, which within the ground have many waies and holes like mines, and thereupon these creatures are called cuniculi.
Holland. Plinie, b. viii. c. 55.

I am the more willing to shew the originall all one; and properly signifying to shroud or hide, which may also appear by our calling in some parts of England, the places made for conies to hide, and shroud themselves in: cony vories, or cony-buries, and in other parts of England cony-burrowes.
Verstegan. Restitution of Decayed Intelligence, c. 7.

At what time began this custom I cannot tell; but I am sure it is more antient than the city of Salisbury; because there come two burgesses to parliament for a place near to it, called old Sarum, which (as I rid in sight of it) if I should tell a stanger that knew not what the word burgess meant, he would think were a couple of rabbets, the place looketh so like a coney-borough.
Hobbs. A Dialogue of the Common Laws of England.

Others there be who make their boast and report with joy unto others, how in the partition of their patrimony they have by cunning casts conny-catched their bretheren, and over-wrought them so by their cautelous circumvention, fine wit and slie policies, as that they have gone away with the better part by odds.—Holland. Plutarch, p. 149.

He drew me from my house with his coney-catching, promising me an island, which I yet hope for.
Shelton. Don Quixote, vol. iii. b. ii. c. 2.

Tat. Marry, I would ha' the old conicatcher coosen'd of all he has, i' the young heyre's defence, by his learned counsell, Mr. Picklock.
B. Jonson. Staple of Newes. After the 4th Act.

——— All's come out, sir,
We are smoak'd for being coney-catchers: my master
Is put in prison.—Massinger. The Renegado, Act iv. sc. 1.

——— Not permit

Alone to range the woods, or haunt the brakes
Where dodging conies sport.—Somervile. The Chase, b. v.

COO, v. } Formed from the sound. See the Coo'ING, n. } example from Pennant.

A word used to represent and denote the sound uttered by the dove or pigeon.

See!—gurgling from a top, a spring distils!
In mournful measures wind the dripping rills;
Soft coos of distant doves, receiv'd around
In soothing mixture, swell the watry sound.
Savage. The Wanderer, c. 1.

In the beginning of winter they assemble in great flocks, and leave off cooing, which they begin in March, when they pair.—Pennant. British Zoology. The Ring Dove.

Let not the coosings of the world allure thee,
Which of her lovers ever found her true?
Young. The Complaint, Night 8.

Whilst wheeling round in airy wanton flights,
The glossy pigeons chase their sportive loves,
Or in soft coosings tell their amorous tale.

Philander was here enjoying the cool of the morning, among the dews that lay on every thing about him, and that gave the air such a freshness, as is not a little agreeable in the hot part of the year.—Addison. Medals, Dial. 3.

If acid things were used only as coolers they would not be so proper in this case.—Arbuthnot. On Aliments, c. 6.

This project [bringing the New River into the house] as I have since heard, is postponed 'till summer season; when it is thought the coolness that proceeds from fountains and cascades will be more acceptable and refreshing to people of quality.—Spectator, No. 5.

These mountains, [the Andes] by intercepting great part of the Eastern winds, which generally blow over the continent of South America, and by cooling that part of the air, which forces its way over their tops, and by keeping besides a large portion of the atmosphere perpetually cool, from its contiguity to the snows with which they are covered; these hills, thus spreading the influence of their frozen crests to the neighbouring coasts and seas of Peru, are doubtless the cause of the temperature and equability, which constantly prevail there.—Anson. Voyage Round the World, b. ii. c. 5.

In some of the mountainous parts of Scotland and Ireland, the milk is made into whey, which has done wonders in this and other cases, where coolers and restoratives are necessary.—Pennant. Zoology. The Goat.

And at length resolving to break the charm myself, and overcome their extreme diffidence, for to this I imputed their silence; I rubbed my hands, and looking as wise as possible, observed that the nights began to grow a little coolish at this time of the year.—Goldsmith, Ess. 1.

To say the truth, when the matter comes to be considered impartially and coolly, their faults, of whatever kind, will admit of much alleviation.
Hurd. On the Uses of Foreign Travel, Dial. 8.

Not that I had reason to expect my solicitations would have much weight with you, but as being unwilling it should appear to those who might apply for them, that any coolness had arisen between us.

Ray says, "A coop, a muck-coop, a lime-coop; a cart or wain made close with boards, to carry any thing that otherwise would fall out."

"A fish-coop is likewise a great hollow vessel made of twigs. A coop is generally used for a vessel, or place to pen up, or enclose any thing; as that wherein poultry are shut up to be fed is called a coop." To coop, then, is—

To keep, hold, or contain; to confine, to shut up, inclose, or incage.

The haberdasher heapeth wealth by hattes,
The barber lives by handling of his hail,
The couper's house is heelde by hooping fattes.
Gascoigne. The Frustes of Warre.

The water is easily cooped up in a glass or bucket, where there are boundaries to keep it in.
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 677.

The way to make it, is to steepe the wheat within certaine cooperie vessels made of wood, in fresh water so much as will cover it well.—Holland. Plinie, b. xviii. c. 7.

He pretends by the words of consecration (which are but five) to bring down Christ's body, and soul, and Deity, and all from the right hand of God in heaven; and to coop them up in the narrow quantity of a wafer and little wine, where he is forced to lodge so long as that wafer is in being, and cannot in the least help himself or get out of it.
Sharp, vol. vii. Ser. 11.

There are others, who affect a very slow time, and are in my opinion much more tuneable than the former, the cooper in particular swells his last note in a hollow voice, that is not without its harmony.—Spectator, No. 251.

——— Staves that nor shrink nor swell,
The cooper's close wrought cask to chesnut owes.
Dodsley. Agriculture, c. 2

CO-O'PERATE, v. Coopera'tion. Coo'perative. Coo'perator. Coo'perant. } Fr. Coopérer; Sp. Cooperar, It. Cooperare; Lat. Cooperare, (co, and operari, to work.) See Operate.

To work or labour together with, in union or combination with; to aid or assist in; to contribute exertions or endeavours for some common purpose.

To the infoûding whereof [of faith] ye sacrament doth nothing worke, nor is no cause therof nor cooperũt therto, nor meane nor instrument therin, but only a bare signyther & a shewer therof.—Sir T. More. Workes, p 383.

—— Bring all the pow'rs of praise

Crashaw. The Name above every Name.

He will, I say, over and above, see the original of all his wealth, all that is worthy to be called such, either immediately or mediately from God; immediately, without any cooperation of ours, as that which is left us by inheritance from honest parents (our fortunes and our Christianity together,) mediately, as that which our lawful labour, our planting and watering, hath brought down upon us
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. Ser. 5.

Wherein I will not deny, and who is there but must confesse, therefore did concur
Both boldness stout and fortitude,

Holland. Plutarch, p. 322.

And yet these affections and passions which of necessity nature hath need of, the same hath reason made so agreeable, so obeysant, so frendly and co-operative, yea, and ready to second all good intentions and purposes ready to be executed.—Id. Ib p. 53.

And the success will invite perhaps many more than your own company to be co-operators with the truth, and contributors to the enlarging the pale of the Christian Church
Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 109. Life.

Yet is not there so much as intimated, that they were co-operators with their Maker, in the framing of the world, of which they are represented as spectators and applauders, but not so much as instruments.—Id. Ib. vol. v. p. 178.

CO-OPTA'TION. Cockeram has Co-optate, to choose. See Option.

A choice or choosing, a taking, a selection.

I confess this is true in the first election and co-optation of a friend, to come to the true knowledge of him by queries and doubts; but when there's a perfect contract made, confirm'd by experience, and a long tract of time, distrust then is mere poison to friendship.—Howell, b. i. s. 5. Let 20.

CO-ORDA'IN. Coo'rdinate, adj. Coo'rdinately. Coordina'tion. } Lat. Con, and ordinare, to ordain, (qv.)

To keep in the same bounds or limits, in the same class, under the same rules; to hold or cause to hold the same rank or station. Co-ordinate is opposed to sub-ordinate.

For the heir is the end of the inheritance, as well as he is the lord of it And so must Christ be of all the creatures appointed and co-ordained with him.
Goodwin. Works, vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 114.

Especially, since one of the three estates is lesser than the three estates together; who in parliament, by the fundamental constitutions of the realme, are not subordinate, but co-ordinate parts of the same great common-councell of the kingdome.—Prynne. Treachery, &c. of Papists, pt. i. p. 41.

Parlaments, which by the law of this land are his bridle: in vain his bridle, if not also his rider. and therefore hath not only co-ordination with him, which you falsely call seditions, but hath superiority above him, and that neither against religion nor right reason.
Milton. Brief Notes on Dr. Griffith's Sermon.

Now these were they who principally insisted upon the absolute co-equality and independent co-ordination, of the three hypostases or persons in the Trinity, as compared with one another.—Cudworth. Intellectual System, b. i. c. 4.

How many of these superior powers there might be, or how far their influence might reach, they know not: uncertain whether there was one Supreme Governor of the whole world or many co-ordinate powers, presiding over each country, climate, or particular place.
Law. Theory of Religion, pt. ii.

For they all with one consent have taught, that the divine nature and perfections do agree to the Father and Son, not collaterally or co-ordinately, but subordinately.
Nelson. Life of Bp. Bull, s. 57.

If legislative powers are not co-ordinate, they cease, in part, to be legislative; and if they be co-ordinate, they are unaccountable, for to whom must that power account which has no superiour?—The house of commons is indeed dissoluble by the king, as the nation has of late been very clamorously told; but, while it subsists, it is co-ordinate with the other powers, and this co-ordination ceases only when the house by dissolution ceases to subsist.
Johnson. The False Alarm.

CO-PA'RCENER. Copa'rcenary. Copa'rtner. Copa'rtnership. } Coparcener is the same as Copartner. Fr. Personnier for Pertionnier, (Huet in Menage.) Lat. Portio, from pars, a part or share.

One who has part or share with others; a sharer. See the example from Blackstone.

Or if combattensie not please,
The land is rich and large,
And thy coparceners may lue,
And vs of death discharge.
Warner. Albion's England, b. iv. c. 22.

COPE, v. Cope, n. } Mid. Lat. Colpus; It. Colpo; Fr. Coup; formerly Coulp; Sp. Golpe: which some derive, through the Lat. Colaphus; Gr. Κολαφος, from Κολαπτ-ειν, tundere, to bruise, (Menage.) But Wachter considers the Ger. Klopfen, (litera L natura mobilis, e sede nativâ transposita,) pulsare, percutere, ferire, to beat, to strike,—to be the root. In the quotation from Lord Berners's translation of Froissart, given to illustrate the noun "Cope," it appears that the original Fr. is Coup; which Cotgrave explains,—a blow, stroake, &c.: also a Vennie in Fencing. Similar to this is the usage by Shakespeare. And thus the application of the word may have been extended generally to—

A fight, encounter, battle, contest.

Junius, however, thinks it is from the A. S. Ceap-an, to traffick, to exchange; to buy or sell; (to pay,—Mer. of V.) and that it may have been extended to any kind of exchange: and thus, to cope with any one in fight is to interchange blows. We still say,—to deal with any person, to deal a blow. To cope, as now used, is equivalent to—

To contend, to encounter, to struggle, strive or contend with; to engage.

But the Scottysh king not regardyng his offres, not performyng his great crakes & boastes, beyng afraid to cope with the Englishe nacion, shamefully & sodeinly fled in the night season with all his powre & company.

If we preserve a communication with him by prayer, for the assistance of his Holy Spirit, we are in constant danger of a relapse. Our own powers cannot cope with the subtleties of the world.—Gilpin, vol. i. Ser. 13.

CO'PEMAN. } A. S. Ceapman, a chapman.
CO'PESMATE. } Copesmate,—a chapmate.

For this we now say, chapman—which is as much to say, as a merchant or cope-man.
Verstegan. Restit. of decayed Intelligence, c. 7.

Assure thee, Celia, he that would sell thee,
Only for hope of gaine, and that uncertaine,
He would have sold his part of paradise
For ready money, had he met a cope-man.
B. Jonson. The Fox, Act iii. sc. 7.

Was ever such a tatter'd rag of man's flesh
Patch'd up for copes-mate to my niece's daughter.
Ford. The Lady's Trial, Act v. sc. 1.

Els my conclusion is,

Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. i. c. 10.

Besides that Paul seemeth not a little to boast himselfe, if men looke on it with a carnall eye, for he saith, that he thinketh not himself inferiour vnto the hyest apostles: and sayth agayne, that if they glory to be the ministers of Christ (though he speak vnwisely) he is more copious in labours, in stripes aboue measure.—Frith. Works, p. 64.

My censurer blames me for not opening more copiously what the opinions of the Lollards and the Wicklifists were.
Burnet. Records. A Letter to Mr. Anscut.

The Lacons could abide no length; the Sophistes of Greece coulde through their copiousnes make an elephaunt of a flye, and a mountayne of a mole-hill.—Udal. Luke, Pref.

I marle in what dull cold nooke he found this lady out? that (being a woman) she was blest with no more copie of wit, but to serve his humour thus.
B. Jonson. Every Man out of his Humour, Act ii. sc. 3.

Those who have gone afore me in that argument have made so copious a harvest, that the issue of my gatherings must needs have been but small, except I had with Ruth glean'd out of their sheaves.
Hales. Remains. Ser. 2 Pet. iii. 16.

If our barren wits were dried up, they might be copiously irrigated from those fruitful well-springs.
Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 303.

But I must now enter into the large field of our tonge copiousnesse, and perhaps long wander vp and downe without finding easie way of issue, and yet leaue many parts thereof vnsurueied.—Camden. Remains. The Eng. Tongue.

Nature itself cannot err, and as men abound in copiousness of language; so they become more wise, or more mad than ordinary.—Hobbs. Of Man, pt. i. c. 4.

The subject [doing good] is so copious, that the study of a whole life cannot exhaust it.—Sharp. Works, vol. i. Ser. 3.

I could account for his [Oree] improving in health as he grew older, only from his drinking less copiously of the ova in his present station as a private gentleman, than he had been accustomed to do when he was regent.
Cook. Voyage, vol. vi. b. iii. c. 7.

The sense of the laws, I am sure, is on my side, which are by no means sparing of the orator's time, it is not brevity, but copiousness, a full representation of every circumstance, which they recommend.—Melmoth. Pliny, b. i. Let. 20.

CO-PLANT. Lat. Planto.
To plant with something else, at the same time, in the same place.

Now France being a passable and plain pervious continent, the Romans quickly diffus'd and rooted themselves in every part thereof, and so co-planted their language, which in a short revolution of time came to be call'd Romand.
Howell, b. iv. Let. 19.

CO-PO'RTION. Lat. Portio, from Pars, a part or share. See COPARCINER.

Faire lady, let it not you seeme disgrace

His sawcy coppered nose, and fierce staring eyes,
His common slanderous tales, which he did in this world devise,
Made Pluto stand in dread. North. Plutarch, p. 288.

For brass, no original, but a compound metall, is made of this stone [lapis calaminaris] and copper; and becometh more hard than copper alone, and therefore the more serviceable for many other purposes.
Fuller. Worthies. Somersetshire.

Divers witnesses were produced, viva voce, who proved the death of several of the parliament party before Colchester, the shooting of poisoned bullets loaded in copperas from the town.—Whitelock. Memorials, an. 1648.

In this fell there is a large vein of copperish sulphur.
Robinson. Nat. Hist. of Cumberland & Westm. 1709.

Although it may be question, whether in this operation, the iron or coperose be transmuted, as may be doubted from the cognation of coperose with copper; and the quantity of iron, remaining after the conversion.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. ii. c. 2.

Some springs in Hungary highly impregnated with vitriolick salts, dissolve the body of iron put into the spring and deposite in lieu of the irony particles carried off, coppery particles brought with the waters out of the neighbouring copper mines.—Woodward. On Fossils.

But as a poor pretending beau,
Because he fain would make a show,

Where hawes and acorns lie?
Browne. The Shepheard's Pipe, Ecl. 2.

But lo, from forth a copse that neighbours by,
A breeding jennet, lusty, young and proud,
Adonis' trampling courser doth espy
And forth he rushes, snorts, and neighs aloud.
Shakespeare. Venus & Adonis.

Generally copse-wood should be cut close, and at intervals as the growth requires.—Evelyn. Forest Trees, c. 3. s. 16.

When the French advanced, our men fired upon them, both in front and from the coppices, with that fury, and with such success that they began to run.
Burnet. Own Time, an. 1708.

Try we thy candour farther: higher art

He shal be born by the copulation of the father and mother, as other men not, as some say, of a lone virgin.
Strype. Mem. A Popish Discourse of Antichrist.

This man is so cunning in his inclusiues & exclusiues, that he discerneth nothing betwene copulatiues and disiunctiues.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 943.

Great feasts were made in Holland, and great sport,
Because of this new match of copulation,
But greater shall in Zeland by report,
For which there was great care and preparation.
Harrington. Orlando, b. ix. s. 87.

For the conjunction και is not to be taken here for a copulative, but, as και is frequently in the Hebrew, for a conjunction casual.—Mede. Works, b. i. Dis. 24.

But if the force of custom, simple and separate, be great, the force of custom copulate, and conjoyned, and collegiate, is far greater.—Bacon. Ess. Of Custom and Education.

By this rule it is also, that words are taken and construed, sometimes by extension, sometimes by restriction; sometimes by implication: sometimes a disjunctiue for a copulatiue; a copulatiue for a disjunctiue.
State Trials. The Case of the Postnati, an. 1608.

Then the promise in the same tenour copulatively. And will give unto thee (still with the same specialty) the keys, &c. and whatsoever thou, &c.
Hammond. Works, vol. ii. p. 384.

But, I suppose, we owe this benefit wholly to the growth and progress of Christianity in the North, by which early and undistinguished copulation, or multitude of wives, were either restrained or abrogated.
Sir W. Temple. On the United Provinces, c. 1.

And for the same reason I understand the Israel of God, to be the same with those who walk by this rule, though joined with them by the copulative και, and; no very unusual way of speaking.—Locke. Gal vi. 11—18. N. 16.

Like land animals they have warm blood, copulate, bring forth, and suckle their young, shewing a strong attachment to them.—Pennant. British Zoology. Cetaceous Fishes.

The other season in which it is dangerous to come in their [bears] way, is at the time of their copulation, which is generally about this time of the year.

Cook. Voyage, vol. vii. b. v. c. 5.

CO'PY, v. / Co'PY, n. / Co'PYING, n. / Co'PIER, or Co'PYER. / Co'PYIST, or Co'PIST. } Fr. Copier; It. Copiare; Sp. Copiar; Dut. Kopieren. Copiam dare, copiam facere exscribendi, describendi. (See Junius, Skinner, and Menage.) To copy is—

To multiply writings; i. e. to write from another writing what is there written; to write, to transcribe, describe or delineate from any pattern, model or example; to describe or delineate in imitation or resemblance; to imitate; to strive to resemble,—to follow an example.

Copy-hold, — see the quotation from Blackstone.

But neither I, neither all the frēdes I could make, might attaine any copie, but onely one written copie, whiche as it seemed was drawen out in great hast: notwithstandyng I can not well ✱dge what the cause should bee, that his boke is kept so secret.—Prith. Workes, p. 108.

Then with relaxed rein admonishing
Her smoaking steeds, they snatch'd her coach away
With sparkling, foaming fervor, copying
Her hasty indignation.—Beaumont. Psyche, c. 5. s. 250.

These, and a thousand more, the fane adorne;
Their fates were painted, ere the men were born,
All copied from the heavens, and ruling force
Of the red star, in his revolving course.

Dryden. Palamon & Arcite.

This order has produced great numbers of tolerable copyers in painting, good chimers in poetry, and harmless projectors in poeticks.—Tatler, No. 166.

I need not enlarge on this relation. It is evident from hence, that the Sorbonists were the original, and our schismaticks in England were the copiers of rebellion; that Paris began, and London followed.

Dryden. Vindication of the Duke of Guise.

This person suddenly going for Africk before the transcript had been examined, and not taking care to leave all the first copy, the author found one or two [blanks] where he was not able to repair the copist's omissions.

Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 467. The Publisher to the Reader.

Now whether the writer be poet, philosopher, or whatever kind; he is in truth no other than a copist after nature.

Shaftsbury. Advice to an Author, pt. iii. s. 3.

This primary or original copying, which in the ideas of Philosophy is imitation, is, in the language of criticism, called invention.—Hurd. Poetical Imitation, s. 1.

But as all these copyists were not equally dexterous in effacing and cleaning these manuscripts, I have seen some in which a part at least of the former writing might be read.

Jortin. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History.

As such tenants had nothing to shew for their estates but these customs, and admissions in pursuance of them, entered on those rolls, or the copies of such entries witnessed by the steward, they now began to be called tenants by copy of court roll, and their tenure itself a copyhold.

Blackstone. Commentaries, b. ii. c. 6.

COQUE'TTE, or / Coque't, n. v. adj. / Co'QUETRY. / Co'QUETTISH. } Cocket, brisk, apish, pert, (North, Grose.) Perhaps, as Skinner thinks, from the Fr. "Coqueter, i.e. to chuck, as a cock among hens; also to strowt it, like a cock on his own dunghill," Cotgrave; who in v. Coquardise, uses cocketness, as its English equivalent. Coquetry is applied to—

Assumed, pretended, affected, forced liveliness, vivacity, or cheerfulness; to insincere attempts to please or be pleasing, to be agreeable, attractive or alluring.

Phillis, who but a month ago
Was marry'd to the Tunbridge beau,
I saw coquetting t' other night
In public with that odious knight.

Swift. Cadenus & Vanessa.

The coquet is in particular a great mistress of that part of oratory which is called action, and indeed seems to speak for no other purpose, but as it gives her an opportunity of stirring a limb, or varying a feature, of glancing her eyes, or playing with her fan.—Spectator, No. 247.

Coquet and coy at once her air,
Both study'd, though both seem neglected;
Careless she is with artful care,
Affecting to seem unaffected. Congreve. Amoret

If a man considers that all his heavy complaints of wounds and deaths rise from some little affectations of coquettry, which are improved into charms by his own fond imagination, the very laying before himself the cause of his distemper, may be sufficient to effect the cure of it

Spectator, No. 377.

The most steady foresight and predisposing order to have every body and every thing ready in its place, and prepared to take advantage of the fortunate figurative moment in this coquetting climate of ours.—Burke. On Scarcity.

Leviculus discovered that this coarseness was nothing more than the coquetry of Cornhill, and the next day returned to the attack.—Rambler, No. 182.

So you with coy coquettish art

Invisible and free:
Love's balmy blessing would you try,
No longer sport a butterfly
But imitate the bee.—P. Whitehead. Butterfly & Bee.

CO'RAL, n. / Co'RAL, adj. / Co'RALLINE. / Co'RALLOID, adj. / CORALLO'IDAL. } Fr. Corail; It. Corallo; Sp. Coral; Lat. Corallium; Gr. Κοραλλιον; of unsettled etymology. Vossius produces various conjectures, and among them, that contained in the passage quoted from Holland's translation of Pliny, (qv.)

Of small corall about hire arm she bare
A pair of bedes, gauded all with grene;
And theron hong a broche of gold ful shene.

Chaucer. Prologue, v. 138.

A little mouth with decent chin,
a corall lip of hue,
With teethe as white as whale his bone
ech one in order due.—Turberville. Praise of his Love.

It is said that this plant [corall] whilst it groweth and is alive, if a man touch it never so little, becomes as hard immediatly as a stone. The fishers therefore to prevent that inconvenience (as knowing the nature thereof) either pluck it up with their nets, or cut it with some sharpe edged yron tooles: which is the cause that it is commonly called curalium, as some make interpretation of the word, (ὁτι εν ὰλι κορεννται, because it is cut and shorne (as it were) in the sea.)

Holland. Pliny, b. xxxii. c. 2.

Besides which fuel, the Dr. tells me, he observed vessels and seed in coralloid shrubs.

Derham. Physico-Theology, b. x. Note (p)

Now that plants and ligneous bodies may endurate under water without approachment of air, we have experiment in coralline, with many coralloidal concretions.

Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. ii. c. 5.

It is a tradition amongst naturalists that coral grows soft at the bottom of the sea, but when it is brought up into the open air, though it retains its bulk and figure, it hardens into a stony concretion.—Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 114.

The weather being equally, with rain, I anchored, at the approach of night, in fifteen fathoms' deep water, over a bottom of coral-sand, and shells.

Cook. Voyage, vol. v. b. ii. c. 3.

Downe goth the corde into the pit,
To whiche he hath at ende knit
A staffe, wherby he saide, he wolde,
That Adrian hym shulde holde.—Gower. Con. A. b. v.

Of the same wool, being mixed with one third part of horse haire they make all their cordage.

Hacklugt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 89.

I willingly on some conditions come
Into their hands, and they as gladly yield me
To the uncircumcis'd a welcom prey,
Bound with two cords; but cords to me were threds
Toucht with the flame. Milton. Samson Agonistes.

From this self same tree [the palm tree] there is drawn a kind of fine flax, of which people make their garments, and with which in the East India they prepare the cordage for their ships.—Raleigh. History of the World, b. i. c. 2. s. 12.

His corded ladders readily prepar'd.

Drayton. The Barons' Wars, b. iii.

Pro. Know (noble lord) they haue deuis'd a meane
How he her chamber window will ascend,
And with a corded ladder fetch her downe.

Shakespeare. Two Gentlemen of Verona, Act iii. sc. 1.

It is very observable, that the same word which in the Greek text is rendered by ωδινας, and in the English by pains, in the Hebrew signifies not only pain, but also a cord or band, according to which it is very easy and proper to conceive, that the resurrection discharged Christ from the bands of death.—South, vol. iii. Ser. 8.

There is no country has better land or water for flax and hemp; and I do verily believe, the navy may be provided here [in Ireland] with sailing and cordage cheaper by far than in England.—Locke. Works. Molyneux to Locke.

Of the leaves of these plants, with very little preparation, they make all their common apparel; and of these they make also their strings, lines, and cordage for every purpose, which are so much stronger than any thing we can make with hemp, that they will not bear a comparison.

Cook. Voyage, vol. ii. b. ii. c. 8.

CO'RDATE. Heart-shaped; from Cor, cordis, the heart.

The young birds vary in having on their breasts transverse bars instead of cordated spots.

Pennant. British Zoology. Genus Falcon.

Any thing that comforts, or cheers the spirits.

Cordial, the adj.—hearty.

For gold in phisike is a cordial;
Therfore he loved gold in special.

Chaucer. The Prologue, v. 445.

Al things whiche be cordiall, that is to say, which do in any wise comfort the heart, do resist pestilence, vehement anger, or heauinesse, &c.—Sir T. Elyot. The Castel of Helth.

The first doth encourage my fainting harte, and the seconde doth begin (already) to employ my vnderstanding, for (alas my good lord) were not the cordial of these two precious spiceries, the corosyue of care would quickely confound me.—Gascoigne. The Steele Glas.

And first behold this cordial julep here
That flames, and dances in his crystal bounds,
With spirits of balm and fragrant syrups mix'd;
Not that Nepenthes, which the wife of Thone
In Egypt gave to Jove-born Helena,
Is of such pow'r to stir up joy as this,
To life so friendly, or so cool to thirst.

Milton. Comus, l. 672.

Many restoratiues, of vertues rare,
And costly cordialles shee did apply,
To mitigate his stubborne malady,
But that sweete cordiall, which can restore
A loue-sick hart, she did to him envy.

Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. iii. c. 5.

But pitying Magd'lens honest sorrow, He
Whose angle potent word all clouds can clear,
In love's mid tone, the only musick she
Could cordially relish, treats her ear.
Beaumont. Psyche, c. 16. s. 164.

That the practice of the ancients had any respect of cordiality or reference unto the heart, will much be doubted, if we consider their rings were made of iron.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iv. c. 4.

For highest cordials all their virtue lose,
By a too frequent and too bold a use;
And what would cheer the spirits in distress,
Ruins our health when taken to excess.
Pomfret. The Choice.

It must indeed be owned that, the greater the number of John's disciples had been, the greater influence it would have had upon the cause of the Messiah, if all of them had cordially received their master's testimony concerning Him.
Hoadly. Works, vol. iii. Ser. 11.

That our most bitter foes (so much depends
On men of name) are turned to cordial friends.
Churchill. The Candidate.

And when disease assaults the heart,
When sickness triumphs over art,
Reflections on a life well past,

Chaucer. Rime of Sir Thopas, v. 13,662.

Cordowes skinnes tanned white, to be made blacke, of them great quantity, and also course wooll to make beds.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. ii. pt. i. p. 127.

For as a poore man is as well of y^e churche as is the pope, so is a cordewer as wel an English man or a French man, as is the kinge of either countrye.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 772.

In this yere was also an act made by auctoritie of the comen codsayll of Ladon, that vpon y^e Sondaye should no maner of thynge within the fraunchise of y^e cytee be bought or solde, nother vytayl nor other thyng, nor none artificer should brynge his ware to any man to be worne or occupyed that day, as taylliours' garmentes or cordwaynors' shoys.—Fabyan. Hen. VI. an. 1545.

Buskins he wore of costliest cordwaine,
Pinkt vpon gold, and paled part per part,
As then the guize was for each gentle swaine.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. vi. c. 2.

The shepherd wore a sheep-gray cloak,
Which was of the finest lock,
That could be cut with sheer,
His mittens were of bawzons' skin,
His cockers were of cordiwin.—Drayton, Ecl. 4. Pastorals.

CORE, n. Fr. Cœur; It. Cuore; from the Lat. Cor, q. cor fructus, (the heart of the fruit,) quoniam instar cordis in medio situm est. Seeing that like the heart it is placed in the centre, (sc.) of fruit, vegetables, &c.

Core is used emphatically with the heart, as My heart's core,—the utmost part or recess of the heart. And see the usage in Piers Plouhman.

Knowst thow a core seynt quath ich that men clepeth treuthe.—Piers Ploughman, p. 120.

And saith, dede flesh must nedes
Be cut out of the core;
For rotten wither'd wedes
Can heale no greuous sore.
Incertaine Auctore. The Louer lamenteth, &c.

The core of rebellion, as you have seen by this, and read of other rebellions, are the universities, which nevertheless are not to be cast away, but to be better disciplined.
Hobbs. Behemoth, pt. i.

Such fruit, I ween, did once deceive
The common parent of mankind,
And made transgress our mother Eve:
Poison its core, though fair its rind.—Prior. Nonpareil.

For oft engender'd by the hazy north,
Myriads on myriads, insect armies waft
Keen in the poison'd breeze; and wasteful eat,
Through buds and bark, into the blacken'd core,
Their eager way. Thomson. Spring.

CO-RE'IGNERS. Reigners or rulers or governours, in union or conjunction with others. See To GOVERN, and To REIGN.

For which cause they are called not only by Maximus Tyrius συναρχοντες θεω, co-rulers with God, but also by Plato himself, τω μεγιστω δαιμονι συναρχοντες, the co-governours and co-reigners with the Supreme God.

Lat. Rivalis, from Rivus, a river. Simplicius est rivales dici, quia ut agricolæ rivum habentes communem, de usu aquæ, ut de aquæ ductu, et aliis, sæpe contendunt. ita, &c. (Vossius.) And in Ulpian, quoted by Gesner, it is said, "Si inter rivales, id est, qui per eundem rivum aquam ducunt, fit contentio de usu aquæ, &c." And then applied, generally, to those—

Who contend or strive for the same object; competitors.

Warner uses Co-rive.

It lesser greeueth he should grudge
That I with him co-riue,
Than his so presumptorie speach
In your dispite to wiue.
Warner. Albion's England, b. iii. c. 15.

Then Scotland warr'd on England, and
In that same warre did end
The knight that had corvued; so
The ladie lost each frende. Id. Ib. b. vii. c. 36.

——— Where's then the sawcy boate,
Whose weake vntimber'd sides but euen now
Co-riual'd greatnesse? Either to harbour fled,
Or made a toste for Neptune.
Shakespeare. Troil. & Cress. Act i. sc. 3.

About this time Cardinal Pool, sent for by the king and queen, came over into England: and had come sooner, but that the emperor, fearing he might prove a corrival with his son Philip, had used means to stop his passage.
Baker. Q. Mary, an. 1555.

And as the title and right to the crowne of England, and the jurisdiction thereof hath thus from time to time beene decided and setled in and by our parliaments, so hath the title and jurisdiction of the crowne of Scotland, beene frequently discussed and setled in our parliaments, upon appeales made to them by the kings of Scotland, and their corrivals to that crowne.
Prynne. Soveraigne Power of Parliaments, pt. i. p. 98.

To reproach the Roman Church for this idolatrous corrivalry, or rather prelation of the virgin in religious worship before Christ.
More. Expos. of the Seven Churches, (1669.) Pref.

By the corrivalship of Shagad his false friend, Rustan was destroyed.—Sir T. Herbert. Travels, p. 149.

It is cleare that our Saviour never meant to compare one tradition with another, as approving some, rejecting others, but with indignation cõplains, that traditions were obtruded to God's people, in a corrivaltie with the written word.

Dut. Kork; Ger. Corck; Sp. Corcho. All, by contraction, from the Lat. Cortex, the bark; for it is in truth the (cortex arboris) bark of a tree, (Skinner.) Cortex ex corium et tego, quia quasi corium tegat, (Isidorus.)

Corky,—of or pertaining to, having the qualities of a cork; light as a cork.

Now concerning corke, the woodie substance of the tree is very small, the mast as bad, hollow, spongeous, and good for nothing; the barke only serveth for many purposes.
Holland. Plinie, b. xvi. c. 8.

Tyr'd with pinn'd ruffs and fans and partlet strips,
And busks and verdingales about their hips:
And tread on corked stilts a prisoner's pace.
Bp. Hall, b. iv. Sat. 6.

The swelling sea seethes in his angry waves,
And smites the earth that dares the traitors nourish:
Yet oft his thunder their light cork outbraves,
Mowing the mountains, on whose temples flourish
Whole woods of garlands.
P. Fletcher. Christ's Victory in Heaven.

For 'tis impossible for him, who hath fully valued the weight of his general guilts, each of which hath lead enough to sink the most corky, vain, fluctuating, proud, stubborn heart in the world; 'tis impossible, I say, for him either wilfully to run into any actual sins, or insolently to hold up his head in the pride of his integrity.
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 644.

When you fish, thus,—use a large cork-float, and lead your line about nine inches from the bottom, otherwise the minnow will come to the top of the water.
Walton. Angler, pt. i. c. 12.

After this a canoe was left fixed to a grapnel in the middle of the harbour, with a bottle in it well corked, inclosing a letter to Mr. Hughes.—Anson. Voy. Ro. the Wo. b. ii. c. 13.

Or haply on some river's cooling bank,
Patiently musing, all content I stand
To hook the scaly glutton. See! down sinks
My cork, that fearful monitor.—Somervile. Field Sports.

They twist each easy fool about,
Nor let them in nor let them out,
But keep them twirling on the fire
Of apprehension and desire,
As cock-chafers with corking-pin
The school boy stabs to make them spin.

Corvus marinus, mergus, the sea-crow. "Fr. Cormoran; It. Corvo marino; Sp. Cuervo marino; ob notabilem voracitatem," (Junius.) See CORVORANT.

See the quotation from Dampier.

Cormorants are just like young ducks in shape, having such feet and bills, they are black with white breasts, and live on small fish, which they take near the shore, or on worms, which they get out of the mud at low water, they taste very fishy, yet are indifferent good meat, they being very fat.—Dampier. Voyage, an. 1676.

A shag, or cormorant, flew several times round the ship. As these birds are seldom, if ever, known to fly far out of sight of land, I judged that some was not far distant.
Cook. Voyage, vol. vi. b. v. c. 12.

Wiclif. Matthew, c. 9.

Vpon the wardein besily they crie,
To yeve him leve but a litel stound,
To gon to mille, and seen his corn yground.
And hardily they dorsten lay hir necke,
The miller should not stele hem half a pecke
Of corn by sleighte, ne by force hem reve.
Chaucer. The Reves Tale, v. 4006, 4009.

Now I have dronke a draught of corny ale,
By God I hope I shal you tell a thing,
That shal by reson ben at your liking.
Id. The Pardoneres Tale, v. 12,390.

The summer's corny crowne,
The winter's frosty gowne,
Nought but thy badge, thy tyvery are.
Sir P. Sidney, Ps. 74.

The wylie labourer in one yere laboureth to geat cornes togither, and in an other yere he soweth and gathereth.
Golden Boke, c. 43.

When in one night, ere glimpse of morn
His shadowy flail had thrash'd the corn.
Milton. L'Allegro

——— And, these scarce blown,
Forth flourish't thick the clustring vine, forth crept
The smelling gourd, up stood the corny reed
Embattell'd in her field. Id. Paradise Lost, b. vii.

He brought me sulpher and salt-petre, and I weighed a portion of each of these, and of coals I gathered up in the hearth, and beat to powder. While his man mixed these in a little engine, I made a small sieve of parchment, which I pricked full of holes with a small iron made hot, and this was to corn it.—Dampier. Voyage, an. 1688.

His angel 'twas, that did before you go,
Tam'd savage hearts, and made affections yield
Like ears of corn when wind assaults the field.
Waller. To the King. On his happy Return.

——— And bringing home the corny ear,
By what instruction does she bite the grain,
Lest, hid in earth, and taking root again,
It might elude the foresight of her care.

By the same trick it hath been clearly shown,
That Venus moon-like grows corniculate
What time her face with flusher light is blown.
More. On the Soul, pt. ii. b. iii. c. 3. s. 62.

That therefore the deer is no short-lived animal, we will acknowledge: that comparatively, and in some sense long-liv'd we will concede; and thus much we shall grant if we commonly account its dayes by thirty six or forty; for thereby it will exceed all other cornigerous animals.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iii. c. 9.

And therefore we observe, that nature in other cornigerous animals, hath placed the horns higher and reclining, as in bucks.—Id. Ib. b. v. c. 29.

But in cornigerous animals, which chew the cudd, there are no lesse then four divisions of distinct position and office [in the ventricle]—Id. Cyrus' Garden, c. 3.

I committed him into the hands of Dr. Thomas Smith in King street (my own corn-cutter) who attended in an outer room, and wrought so speedy a cure upon him, that I thought fit to send him also away without his cane.

Stow. Queen Elizabeth, an. 1586.

CO'RPORAL. Fr. Caporal, It. Caporale; Sp. Caboral. Junius and Skinner think from Caput, the head; caput decuriæ militaris. But Menage says the old French word was Corporal; and this Junius thinks was derived from a body of soldiers, living in the same tent, sub uno decurione. Concorporales, used by Ammianus, is rendered by Holland, fellow-soldiers, (pp. 179, 344.)

Likewise the dukes assigne pieces unto every millenarie, or conducter of a thousand soldiers, the millenaries unto each captaine of 100, the captaines unto euery corporall of ten.—Hacluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 60.

A corporal fierce, a nurse, and child that cried,
And a fat landlord fill'd the other side.

Fr. Corporel; It. Corporale; Sp. Corporal; Lat. Corporalis, from Corpus, body. Vossius has various conjectures. Martinius decides,—corpus est, quod carpi potest in partes. Scheidius,—corpus, quod carpitur, depascitur, opp. ad mentem, quod manet.

Stow uses the verb Corporate, as we now use incorporate;—to embody.

Bodily, pertaining to the body; opposed to — spiritual or mental.

Corporale, quo domini corpus, i. panem consecratum, tegebant, (Junius.) Hence "Corporal oath," from the custom of touching this corporal; which is also sometimes called corporas.

To corporify,—to embody, to bring to a bodily state.

Corpulence,—largeness, bigness, grossness, of body; fatness.

Corps or Corpse, also written Corse, (qv.) a body, a mere body, i. e. a lifeless, a dead body, a carcass. Also applied, to a body of men; of soldiers; (of laws, Bacon,) who also writes Core. See the quotation from his Historie of Hen. VII.

On a tombe is all the faire above,
And under is the corps, swiche as ye wote;
Swiche was this hypocrite both cold and hote.
Chaucer. The Squieres Tale, v. 10,823.

If thou be fat, other corpulent,
I han wot them say thou art a great glotten.
Ludgate. Ballade of Good Counsaile.

Julus eke ravyshed out of his armes,

The giltlesse corpses of his folke lie dead.
Surrey. Virgile. Æneis, b. iv.

Than they departed and went into the feldes, and this squier had with hym the patent and corporal.
Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. i. c. 200.

All corporall domages, that chaunce to mortall men, are by medicines healed, or by reason remedied, or by length of time cured, or els by deth ended.—Golden Boke, c. 3.

And nowe wyth this I shall make an ende, shewynge you in that, how you maye see, and folowe Christe no lesse at this present tyme, than yf he were corporallye walkynge afore you, as Andrewe sawe him, whiche is to folowe his commandements.
Strype. Orig. No. 68. Pole's Speech to the Citizens.

To that face [of a popish mass] belongeth a superaltare, a chalice, a cover, a cake, a corporas, cruats, candlesticks, censers, and lights: which we have none.
Id. Ib. No. 39. Bale from Basil, to Mr. Ashley.

Now also to the preiudice of the corporation of the maior, communalties and citizens of our citie of London, now to the preiudice of any person or persons, body politique, or corporate, or incorporate.—Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 270.

Also aboute the same tyme he [kynge Stephen] founded the abbey of Feuersham in Kent, where he nowe corporally restyth.—Fabyan, vol. i. c. 233.

They prouided mee alwayes of a strong horse, because I was very corpulent and heauy; but whether he ambled a gentle pace or no, I durst not make any question.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 112.

But hee [Hen. VII.] was more doubtfull of the raysing of forces to resist the rebels, than of the resistance itselfe; for that he was in a core of people, whose affections he suspected.—Bacon. Hen. VII. p. 17.

And we see what disputation and argument the alteration of some one law doth cause and bring forth, how much more the alteration of the whole corps of the law?
It. Union of England & Scotland.

——— That he should
Yield his free-living youth a captive for
The freedom of his aged father's corpse,
And rather choose to want Life's necessaries,
Liberty, hope of fortune, than it should
In death be kept from Christian ceremony.
Massinger. The Fatal Dowry, Act ii. sc. 1.

First, God in thee a liuing soule inspires,
Whose glorious beames hath made thee farre more bright,
Than is the sunne, the spring of corp'rall light.
Beaumont. On Ascension Day.

While she so many strokes heaps in excesse,
That fond grosse phansie quite for to suppresse
Of the soule's corporality.
More. On the Soul, pt. ii. b. ii. c. 3. s. 29.

Whence may be guess'd what their function was: was it to go about circled with a band of rooking officials, with cloak-bags full of citations, and processes to be serv'd by a corporality of griffin-like promoters and apparitors?
Milton. Of Reformation.

Psellus a Christian, sometimes tutor (saith Cuspinian) to Michael Parapinatius, emperour of Greece, a great observer of the nature of devils, holds they are corporall, and have aerial bodies, that they are mortall, live and dye.
Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 40.

Of such small qualities as God hath endued mee withall, I render to his goodnes my most humble thankes, intending with all my witte and diligence to get and acquire to me such notable vertues and princely qualities as you haue alleaged to be corporated in my person.
Stow. Hen. VIII. an. 1545.

Of this we find some footsteps in our law,
Which doth her root from God and nature take;
Ten thousand men she doth together draw,
And of them all one corporation make.
Davies. Immortality of the Soul, s. 8.

For whose corporature, lineaments of body, behaviour of manners, and conditions of mind, she must trust to others, and put in hazard and adventure, whether after she shall like them or not.—Strype. Life of Sir T. Smith, App. No. 4.

The affections being more gross and corporeous (from thence called the beds of the soul) and so easily chained and fettered.—Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 630.

A second hindrance was the grossness and earthiness of their fancy, which was not able to conceive God to be any thing but a corporeous substance.—Id. Ib. p. 641.

When I consider how deeply in this state we are immersed in the body, I can methinks scarce imagine, that presently upon the quitting on't, we shall be stript of all corporeity, for this would be such a jump as is seldome or ever made in nature.—Glanvill. Pre-existence of Souls, c. 13.

——— Not all
Minims of Nature; some of serpent kinde
Wond'rous in length and corpulence involv'd
Their snakie folds, and add'ed wings.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. vii.

Men naturally cannot understand any thing but by phantasms, and those still mixing in the contemplation of God, make men phansie God μετ' ὄγκου with matter and corpulency; and the mathematicks are a necessary means to help us to abstract from that. I would to God we had some such engine, or crane, or pully to elevate our fancies, to make it possible to think any thing pleasure, which is not corpulent and carnal.—Hammond. Works, vol. iv. Ser. 7.

The hall is heap'd with corps; the sprinkled gore
Besmears the walls, and flotes the marble floor.
Dryden. Cymon & Iphigenia.

But the most absurd pretence of this kind and the most opposite to the doctrine delivered, is, that famous miracle of the corporal presence in the eucharist; which is done so much in the dark, that nobody ever did or can see it, either before or after it was done, or even while it is doing; no not the doer himself, as loudly as he may boast of it.
Atterbury, vol. iii. Ser. 1.

Lest any man should mistake my words, and think that I mean, that altho' Christ be not corporally in the outward and visible signs, yet he is corporally in the persons that duly receive them; this is to advertise the reader, that I mean no such thing.—Sharp, vol. vii. Ser. 16.

Poor heart, no more the spring of vital heat!
Curs'd be the hands that tore thee from thy seat!
The course is finish'd which thy fates decreed,
And thou from thy corporeal prison freed.
Dryden. Theodore & Honoria.

The first poets and theologers of Greece and the east considered the generation of things, as ascribed rather to a divine cause, but the Physici to natural causes subordinate to, and directed still by a divine; except some corporealists and mechanics who vainly pretend to make a world without a God.—Berkley. Works. Siris, s. 259.

[Spring water] seems to contain in it besides the steams of several bodies wandering in the air, which may be supposed to impregnate it, a certain spirituous substance, which may be extracted out of it, and is by some mistaken for the spirit of the world corporified, upon what grounds, and with what probability, I may elsewhere, perchance, but must not now, discourse to you.—Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 495.

You'll find your rhyming kinsman well in case,
For ever fix'd to the delicious place,
Tho' not like I—with corpulence o'ergrown,
For he has twenty cares, and I but one.
Pitt. Epistle to J. Pitt, Esq.

And therefore almost the whole musculous flesh of the body is bestowed upon the back, and serves for the vibration of the tail, the heaviness and corpulency of the water, requiring a great force to divide it.—Ray. On the Creation, pt. i.

From some such commotions of the air I imagine it is, that at Grand Cairo the plague immediately ceases as soon as the Nile begins to overflow, although Mr. Boyle attributes it to nitrous corpuscles.
Derham. Physico-Theology, b. i. c. 2. Note 2.

The mechanical or corpuscular philosophy, though peradventure the oldest, as well as the best in the world, hath lain buried for many ages in contempt and oblivion; till it was happily restor'd and cultivated anew by some excellent wits of the present age.—Bentley, Ser. 7.

I writ [to Pyrophilus] some kind of introduction to the principles of the mechanical philosophy, by expounding to him as far as my thoughts and experiments enabled me to do, in a few words, what, according to the corpuscularian notions, may be thought of the nature and origin of qualities and forms.—Boyle. Works, vol. iii. p. 4.

But we cannot so certainly and positively tell what kind of spirituality that of the angels is, whether it be void of all manner of corporeity, as modern divines generally hold, or joined with some certain corporeity, not of the grosser sort.
Bp. Bull. The Existence of Angels and their Nature.

For truth, the greatest of intellectual goods is the produce of undisturbed reason; and health, the greatest of the corporeal, is the blooming fruit of temperance; and yet we can be content to be deprived of both, for the sordid pleasure of a riotous, unmeaning jollity.
Warburton. Works, vol. x. Ser. 22.

The municipal or corporate towns in Italy were governed by magistrates of their own, who probably made much the same sort of figure in their rural senate as our burgesses in their town hall.—Melmoth. Cicero, b. ii. Let. 5. N. 9.

They heard Jesus use a word in their vulgar idiom which signified to see corporeally; and common sense led them to conclude he used it in the vulgar meaning.
Warburton. Occasional Reflections, pt. ii. Rem. 5.

The day following I received an express from Pansa, to attend him at Bononia; but in my way thither, being informed of his death, I immediately returned back to join my little corps.—Melmoth, b. xiv. Let. 17.

Some labour fasting, or but slightly fed
To lull the grinding stomach's hungry rage:
Where nature feeds too corpulent a frame
'Tis wisely done.
Armstrong. The Art of Preserving Health, b. iii.

My mother conjured me to make my escape at any rate, which, as I was young, I might easily effect; as for herself, she said, her age and corpulency rendered all attempts of that sort impossible.
Melmoth. Pliny to Tacitus, b. vi. Let. 20.

COR-RADIA'TION. Lat. Radius; Gr. Ῥαβδος, a rod; from ῥασσ-ειν, amputare, abscindere, to cut off. See Radiant.

A union, combination or convergence of rays.

It seemeth that the impression of colour is so weak, as it worketh not but by a cone of direct beames, or right lines; whereof the basis is in the object, and the verticall point in the eie; so as there is a corradiation and conjunction of beames.—Bacon. Natural History, s 277.

Plato attributeth it to the corradiation or conjunction of light, for that the light of the eyes reacheth a good way within the aire of like nature, and the light likewise issuing from the visible bodies, cutteth the aire between, which of itselfe is liquid and mutable, and so extendeth it together with that fiery power of the eye, and this is it which is called the conjunct light or corradiation of the Platonicks.
Holland. Plutarch, p 6.

CORRE'CT, v. CORRE'CT, adj. CORRE'CTABLE, CORRE'CTION, CORRE'CTIONER, CORRE'CTIVE, adj. CORRE'CTIVE, n. CORRE'CTLY. CORRE'CTNESS. CORRE'CTOR. CORRE'CTORY, adj. CO'RRIGIBLE. Fr. Corriger; It. Correggere; Sp. Corregir; Lat. Corrigere, correctum; (con, and regere, to rule or order.)

To make or fashion according, or conformable, to rule or order; to bring within, or reduce to, rule or order; to reform; to free from error, from faults; to improve, to amend, (sc.) by chastisement, by punishment; and thus, to chastise, to punish.

Chaucer uses corrige, immediately from the Fr. Corriger.

Eschewe thou a man eretike after con and the secounde correccioun, witynge that he that is such a maner is subvertid and trespasith, and is dampned by his owne doom.
Wiclif. 2 Tyte, c. 3.

Any man myght thinke that the maners of shrewes ben corrued and chastised by vengeaunce, and that they be brought to the right way by the drede of tourment.
Chaucer. Boecius, b. iv.

But all for nought, I sette not an hawe
Of his proverbes, ne of his olde sawe;
Ne I wold not of him corrected be.
Id. The Wif of Bathes Prologue, v. 6244.

Then had he thurgh his jurisdiction
Power to don on hem correction.
Id. The Freres Tale, v. 6904.

Under what maner therefore should I now submit this booke to be corrected and amended of them, whiche can suffer nothyng to bee well.—Tyndall. Workes, p. 237.

And thus (vnder correction bee it tolde)
Hath Gascoigne gathered in his garden molde.
Gascoigne. Hearbes.

And of Aristotel it is named in Greke Diorthotice, which is in Englishe corrective.—Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. iii. c. 1.

And when he once became the kinges corrector & master, ye rather hys king & emprour (saith the text) by her meanes he was elected bishop of Winchestre after the decease of Elphegus.—Bale. English Votaries, pt. i. c. 1.

Peter Chapot first was a corrector to a printer in Paris, after he had been at Geneva, to doe good to the church of Christ like a good man, hee came with bookes of holie Scripture into France and dispersed thē abroad vnto the faithfull.
Fox. Table of French Martyrs, p. 822.

Considering therefore, that he is not corrigible, we are driuen to the verie extremitie of the lawe, and with great heauinesse of heart wee now proceede to the publication of the sentence definitiue, against him.
Id. Martyrs. The Lord Cobham's Condemnation.

In answer St Austin himself granted that those among them, who sought the truth, being ready, when they found it, to correct their error, were not heretucks, and therefore notwithstanding their error, might be saved.
Chillingworth. Rel. of Prot. pt. i. c. 7.

Some maintain, that the coldness and windinesse (easily correctable with spice) is recompensed by temperate looseness, caused by the moderate drinking thereof.
Fuller. Worthies. Gloucestershire.

Hee [Caligula] could not forbeare so much as in the publike theaters and shew places, but that he would both fall a singing with the tragedian as he pronounced, and also counterfaite and openly imitate the gesture of the player, as it were by way of praise or correction.
Holland. Suetonius, p. 148.

You filthy famish'd correctioner, if you be not swing'd, I'le forsweare halfe Kirtles.
Shakespeare. 2 Part Hen. IV. Act v. sc. 4.

If it [knowledge] be taken without the true corrective thereof, (it) hath in it some nature of malignity, or venome full of flatuous symptomes. This antidote, or corrective spice, the mixture whereof tempers knowledge and makes it so soveraigne, is charity.
Bacon. On Learning, by G. Wats, b. i. c. 1.

Things odious and correctory are called strictæ in the law, and that which is favourable is called res ampla, because as the matter of that is to be made as little as it may be, so the matter of this may be enlarged.
Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. iii. c. 6.

But there are in nature some things which are the instruments of vertue and vice too, some things, which of themselves indeed are culpable, but yet such which do minister to glorious events, and such which as they are not easily corrigible, so they are not safe to be done away.
Id. On Repentance, c 8 s. 8.

"I here send you a few observations concerning some plants, seldom used in medicine, being esteemed poisonous, which if truly corrected or exactly dosed, may perhaps prove the most powerful and effectual medicines yet known." Having then given an account of some of their correctives, he gives the following examples.
Derham. Physico-Theology, b. ii. c. 6.

As to the bishops, though some of them were learned and conscientious, yet the rest, and the greater part, were such that there could be no good discipline exercised, for the restraint of sin, and for the due correction of swearing, rioting, neglect of God's word, and other scandalous vices.
Strype. Memorials. Edw. VI. an 1553.

But in such lays as neither ebb nor flow,
Correctly cold, and regularly low,
That, shunning faults, one quiet temper keep,
We cannot blame indeed, but we may sleep.
Pope. Essay on Criticism.

If it blows a happy gale, we must set up all our sails, though in so doing it sometimes happens that we follow those motions where our natural heat is more powerful than our care and correctness.—Dryden. On Dufresnoy, Note 60.

You see fire, life, and spirit run through the whole, and at the same time correctness, which shows he is used to writing.—Tatler, No. 91.

Fifthly, nor can they (he says) be assured that the transcribers, and printers, and correctors of the press have carefully and faithfully done their part, in transcribing and printing the several copies and translations of Scripture aright.—Tillotson. Rule of Faith, pt. ii. s. 3.

A satyr should expose nothing, but what is corrigible, and make a due discrimination between those who are, and those who are not, the proper objects of it.—Spectator, No. 209.

It was his manner to intermix his literary pursuits in such sort as to make the lighter relieve the more serious; and those again, in their turn, temper and correct the other.
Warburton. Life by Hurd.

Along with much evil, there is some good in monarchy itself; and some correctives to its evil from religion, from laws, from manners, from opinions, the French monarchy must have received.—Burke. On the French Revolution.

CO'R-RELATE, n. CORRELA'TION. CORRE'LATIVE, adj. CORRE'LATIVE, n. CORRE'LATIVELY. Lat. Con, and past part. relatus; (re, and latus, raised.)

For the particular kind of relation, or mutual and reciprocal relation to which this word is applied, see especially the examples from Clarke and Hume.

This conclusion is correlative with the first article of our faith, I beleeue in God the Father Almighty, &c.
State Trials. Protestation of John Wiclif.

For the signe & the thinge signified bee correlatiues, one answering the tother or els must it be but a false and a dyssymbling signe which these papistis so stoughtly defende with fyre and fagots.—Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, c. 3.

We confess the name [merit] might be admitted, if taken in the large and more general sense, for any work having relation to a reward to follow it; or whereby a reward is quocunque modo obtained; in a word, as the correlate indifferent either to merces gratiæ or justitiæ, the reward of grace or of justice.—Mede. Works, b. i. Dis. 27.

Spiritual things and spiritual men are correlatives, and cannot in reason be divorced.—Spelman. On Tythes, p. 141.

Our Saviour is a king three manner of wayes, and so correlatively hath three distinct several kingdoms.
Hales. Rem. Ser. Joan, xviii. 36

But, that any thing is, and that there is a real reason in nature why it is, rather than is not; these two are as necessarily connected as any two correlates whatever, as light and depth, &c.—Clarke. On the Evidences. Ans. to Sixth Let.

Concubine is, no doubt a relative name, as well as wife, but in languages where this, and the like words, have not a correlative term, these people are not so apt to take them to be so, as wanting that evident mark of relation, which is between correlatives, which seems to explain one another, and not to be able to exist, but together.
Locke. Hum. Underst. b. ii. c. 25.

For giving being a relative action, (and so requiring a correlative to answer it) Giving on one part transfers no property unless there be an accepting on the other.
South, vol. i. Ser. 7.

It is an universal observation, which we may form upon language, that where two relative parts of a whole bear any proportion to each other, in numbers, rank, or consideration, there are always correlative terms invented, which answer to both the parts, and express their mutual relation.—Thus man and woman, master and servant, father and son, prince and subject, stranger and citizen, are correlative terms.—Hume. Essay 11. Note 10.

Between two correlative terms, it is totally indifferent to the meaning which of the two correlations is expressed.
Tooke. Div. of Purley, vol. i. c. 9. Note.

CORRE'PTION. Lat. Corripere, reptum; (con, and rapere, to seize, apprehendere, and met. reprehendere.)

Reprehension, reproof, chiding, admonition.

Meaning that all contumacious sinners, that upon admonition and ecclesiastical correption, refuse to repent, are to be accounted enemies and strangers to the rights and promises of the Gospel, enemies to the religion, and separate from God, and given over to a reprobate sence.
Bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. iii. c. 4.

'Twill not be amiss to premise that there is a double correption or admonition; the former, paternal or authoritative; the latter, fraternal or charitative.
Hammond. Works, vol. i. p. 291.

COR-RESPO'ND, v. CORRESPO'NDENT, adj. CORRESPO'NDENT, n. CORRESPO'NDENCE. CORRESPO'NDENCY. CORRESPO'NDENTLY. CORRESPO'NDING. CORRESPO'NSIVE. Fr. Correspondre, Sp. Corresponder; It. Corrispondere; Lat. Co, and respondere, to answer. See Respond and Sponsor.

To correspond, generally, is—

To answer one to another; to have or hold an interchange, or intercourse, in answer one to another; to be or act in answer or return; to answer or be answerable to; suitable, or agreeable to, according with; and thus,—to suit, to fit, to be adapted or proportioned to.

Ye will now so acquit your self, as shall correspond to the perfect expectation, and firm opinion that we have of you.
Burnet. Records, No. 2. The King to his Ambassadors.

Not doubting but that ye will now above all other things, look vigilantly hereunto, and so acquit yourself in the same, as it may well appear that your acts shall be correspondent to our firm trust and expectation.—Id. Ib.

Whose maners also and conuersation being correspondent to the same, were such that all they which knewe him, reputed, and esteemed him to bee a man of most vertuous disposition, and of a life vnspotted.—Tyndall. Life by Fox.

Thirdly these kiges shuld geue vnto these chosen & lerned men their new names correspōding their vertewe and offices.—Joye. Exposicion of Daniel, c. 1.

——— Self-knowing, and from thence
Magnanimous to correspond with heav'n,
But grateful to acknowledge whence his good
Descends. Milton. Paradise Lost, b. vii

——— There placed is
Mischief's old Master! close about him clings
A curl'd knot of embracing snakes, that kiss
His correspondent cheeks.
Crashaw. Sospetto d'Herode, b. i.

——— He holds
That correspondence, there, with all that are
Neere about Cæsar, as no thought can passe
Without his knowledge.—B. Jonson. Sejanus, Act. iv.

Vpon the tombe of D. John Beckingale sometime Bishop of Chichester this is engrauen, which I set here for rare correspondency of the rime.—Camden. Remains. Epitaphes.

And he was to sanctifie others of mankind, and this he had not so fitly and correspondently according to the law of nature done, had not both they and he been all of one.
Goodwin. Works, vol. iii. pt. iii. p. 56.

—— Priam's six-gated city
Darden and Timbia, Helias, Chetas, Troien,
And Antenonides with massie staples
And corresponsive and fulfilling bolts
Stirre [sperr?] vp the sonnes of Troy.
Shakspeare. Troyl. & Cress. Prol.

Each object must be fix'd in the due place,
And differing parts have corresponding grace:
Till, by a curious art disposed we find
One perfect whole of all the pieces join'd.
Dryden. The Art of Poetry.

They who have skill to compare, in the original, certain passages in the Books of Chronicles, with the correspondent places in the Book of Kings, will be able to find instances of these things, and very often also to see plainly how and whence they happened.—Clark. On the Evidences, Prop. 14.

The correspondencies of types and antitypes, though they are not themselves proper proofs of the truth of a doctrine, yet they may be very reasonable confirmations of the foreknowledge of God; of the uniform view of Providence under different dispensations, of the analogy, harmony, and agreement between the Old Testament and the New.—Id. Ib.

The practice of benignity, of courtesie, of clemency do at first sight, without aid of any discursive reflection, obtain approbation and applause from men; and correspondently uncharitable dispositions and practices (malignity, harshness, cruelty) do offend the mind with a disgustful resentment of them.—Barrow, vol. i. Ser. 28.

—— There to perform
Their various motions, corresponding all
To one harmonious plan, which fablers feign
The mystic music of the distant spheres.
Cooper. The Harmony of Music, Poetry, &c.

You accuse me, then, of being a negligent correspondent: but, believe me, I have never once omitted writing, whenever any of your family gave me notice that a courier was setting out to you.—Melmoth. Cicero, b. xi. Let. 26.

Having no general apostolical mission, being a citizen of a peculiar state, and being bound up in a considerable degree by its public will, I should think it at least improper and irregular for me to open a formal publick correspondence with the actual government of a foreign nation, without the express authority of the government under which I live.
Burke. On the French Revolution.

I make bold to tell him, that a similitude and correspondency between the event and the transaction which prefigured it, is not enough to shew this dependency, to the satisfaction of unbelievers
Warburton. The Divine Legation, b. vi. Note K.

CORRO'BORATIVE, adj.
To strengthen, to confirm, to establish; to make strong, firm, stable, or steadfast.

Then Barnes answered, I spake nothing but the truth out of the Scriptures, according to my cõcience, and according to the olde doctours, and then he deliuered him vi. sheetes of paper written, to confirme and corroborate his sayinges.
Barnes. Works. Life, p. 3.

This, with all other such matter as may serve to the purpose ye shall extend as well as ye can, and by that meanes get and attain as much to your purpose for the corroboration and surety of all things to be done here as is possible.
Burnet. Rec. b. ii. No. 23. Dispatch to the Cardinal.

Our Saviour himself when in his agony was corroborated by an angel.—Grew. Cosmo. Sacra, b. v. c. 4.

A decoction thereof doth corroborat any member or part of the bodie which groweth to bee sencelesse or benummed, if the same be fomented therewith.
Holland. Plinie, b. xxiv. c. 4.

And therefore as Machiavel well noteth (though in an ill-favoured instance) there is no trusting to the force of nature, nor to the bravery of words, except it be corroborate by custom.—Bacon. Ess. Of Custom and Education.

There be divers sorts of bracelets fit to comfort the spirits: and they be of three intentions; refrigerant: corroborant; and aperient. For corroboration and comfortation, take such bodies as are of astringent quality, without manifest cold.—Bacon. Naturall History, § 961 2.

Nay what shall the Scripture itselfe? Which is like an apothecaries shop, wherein are all remedies for all infirmities of minde, purgatives, cordialls, alteratives, corroboratives, lenitives, &c.—Burton. Anat. of Melancholy, p. 250.

Besides its medicinal virtues, it [silphium] was a wonderful corroborater of the stomach.—Evelyn. Acetaria.

And this shall suffice for an example of the errors which are brought into the church, from the entities and essences of Aristotle: which it may be he knew to be false philosophy, but writ it as a thing consonant to and corroborative to their religion; and fearing the fate of Socrates.
Hobbs. Leviathan, pt. iv. c 46.

The absence of such assurances [of innocence] at a time when a person is laying his heart open to his friends, and professedly shewing them where the strength of his defence must lie, is undeniably a corroborating evidence, and a very strong one, of his own consciousness that the accusation against him is true.
Hoadly. Letters signed Britannicus, Let. 32.

We shall endeavour to make appear: 1st, that wit and humour are corroborative of religion, and promotive to true faith.—Shaftesbury. Characteristics, vol. iii. Misc. 2.

Joy amidst ills corroborates, exalts;
'Tis joy and conquest, joy and virtue too.
Young. The Complaint, Night 9.

Having considered the evidence given by the plays themselves, and found it in their favour, let us now enquire what corroboration can be gained from other testimony.
Johnson. Gen. Obs. on Shakspeare's Plays.

Statesmen purge vice with vice, and may corrode
The bad with bad, a spider with a toad.
Donne. To the Countess of Bedford.

Those evil lucks in numbere many are,
That to thy footsteps do themselves apply;
And still thy conscience corrosiv'd with grief,
Thou but pursu'st thyself, both robb'd and thief.
Drayton. The Barons' Wars.

And more than all the rest, this griev'd him chief,
And to his heart a corsive was eternall,
To think that Avarice should her entice,
Vpon her chastity to set a price.
Harrington. Orlando, b. xliii. s. 83.

—— The soft delicious air
To heal the scarr of these corrosive fires
Shall breathe her balme.—Milton. Paradise Lost, b. ii.

The physick of the good Samaritan in the Gospel, wherein there was a corrodent and a lenient compunction, and consolation.—Bp. of London. Vine Palatine, (1614,) p. 17.

Styx is a fountain of Arcadia, whose waters are so deadly, that they presently kill whatsoever drinks thereof; so corrodiating that they can only be contained in the hoof of a mule.—Sandys. Christ's Passion. Notes, p. 95.

And this is that the chymists mainly drive at in the attempt of their aurum potabile; that is, to reduce that indigestible substance into such a form as may not be ejected by siege, but enter the cavities, and less accessible parts of the body, without corrosion.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iii. c. 22.

How much corrosive salts may dulcify themselves by corroding some bodies, you may easily try, by pouring distilled vinegar, or moderate spirit of vitriol, upon a competent proportion of corals, or crabs' eyes, or pearls.
Boyle. Works, vol. i. p 374.

The second qualification of a corrodible body is, that its consistent corpuscles be of such a bulk and solidity, as does not render them incapable of being disjoined by the action of the insinuating corpuscles of the menstruum.
Boyle. Works, vol. iv. p. 324.

Salad-oil is generally reputed to consist of fat and unctious particles, and therefore to be a greater resister of corrosion.
Id. Ib. vol. ii. p. 188.

Corrosibility being the quality, that answers corrosiveness, he that has taken notice of the advertisement I formerly gave about the use of the term corrosiveness, in these notes, may easily judge in what sense I employ the name of the other quality.—Id. Ib.

Though at first it tasted somewhat corrosively (perhaps because the proportion betwixt the nitrous spirit and the pot-ashes was not duly observed) yet after it had a while remained upon the tongue, the taste of it much emulated that of saltpetre.—Id. Ib. vol. i. p. 363.

I presume to employ corrosiveness in a greater latitude, so as to make it almost equivalent to the solutive power of liquors, referring other menstruums to those, that are corrosive or fretting, (though not always as to the most proper, yet) as to the principal and best-known species.
Id. Ib. vol. iv. p 314.

I have seen men between twenty and thirty, whose fore teeth have been consumed almost down to the gums, though no two of them were exactly of the same length and thickness, but irregularly corroded like iron by rust.
Cook. Voyage, vol. ii. b. iii. c. 9.

Though it [peevishness] breaks not out in paroxysms of outrage, nor bursts into clamour, turbulence, and bloodshed, it wears out happiness by slow corrosion, and small injuries incessantly repeated.—Rambler, No. 74.

The rough file grates; yet useful is its touch,
As sharp corrosives to the schirrous flesh,
Or to the stubborn temper, keen rebuke.
Jago. Edge-Hill, b. iii.

CO'RRUGATE, v. } Fr. Corrugation; a wrinkling or furrowing of the skin. (Cotgrave.)
CO'RRUGATE, adj.
CORRUGA'TION.
Lat. Corrugare, (con, and rugare, from ruga, a wrinkle;) which Vossius thinks is from Ῥυ-ειν, epu-ein, trahere; for ruga is nothing more than the skin contracted into wrinkles or furrows.

To wrinkle or furrow; to draw or contract into wrinkles or furrows.

Cockeram has, "Corruge,—to frown, to wrinkle."

The cramp (no doubt) commeth of the contraction of sinewes: which is manifest in that it commeth either by cold, or drinesse; as after consumptions, and long agues; for cold and drinesse do (both of them) contract and corrugate
Bacon. Natural History, s. 964.

And this rising of it is also further'd by the wrinkling up and shortning of the upper part of the stomach; which still returns into its natural corrugation, as the masse of liquid meat leave soaking it.—Digby. Of Bodies, c. 34.

Extended views a narrow mind extend;
Push out its corrugate, expansive make,
Which, ere long, more than planets shall embrace
Young. Complaint, Night 9

The full lips, the rough tongue, the corrugated cartilaginous palate, the broad cutting teeth of the ox, the deer, the horse, and the sheep, qualify this tribe for browsing upon their pasture.—Paley. Natural Theology, c 12.

To destroy, (sc.) the soundness, the integrity, the purity; to deprave, to vitiate, to spoil, to putrify; be, or cause to be or become, putrid or rotten, to rot; (met.)—
To destroy or deprave, or vitiate, (sc.) soundness of mind, purity of heart; to beguile, to be, or cause to be, beguiled, wicked or vicious.

Wiclif and Chaucer write Corrump, immediately from the French.

To distrie hem that corrumpiden the erthe.
Wiclif. Apocalips, c 11.

But these men blasfemen whateuer thingis thei knowen not, for whateuer thingis thei knowe kyndeli as coumbe beestis in these thei ben corrupt.—Id. First Ep. Jonas, c 1.

But these speake euil of those thinges which they know not: and what thyng they know naturally: as beastes whyche are wythout reasó, in thõ thinges thei corrupt thẽ selues
Bible, 1551. Ib.

For it bihoueth this corruptible thing to clothe incorruption, and this deedli thing to put awei undeedliness.
Wiclif. 1 Corinthians, c. 15.

For thys corruptyble must put on incorruptibilyte: and thys mortall must putte on immortalyte.—Bible, 1551. Ib.

For he that sowith in his fleisch, of the fleisch he schal repe corruption, but he that sowith it in the spyryt, of the spyryt he schal repe euerlastynge lyf.—Wiclif. Gal. c. 6.

He that soweth in his fleshe, shall of the flesh reepe corruption. But he that soweth in the spirite, shall of the spirite reepe life euerlastynge.—Bible, 1551. Ib.

The clotered blood, for any leche-craft,
Corrumpeth, and is in his bouke ylaft,
That neyther veine-blood, ne ventousing,
Ne drinke of herbes may ben his helping.
Chaucer. The Knightes Tale, v. 2749.

For nature hath not taken his beginning
Of no partie ne cantel of a thing,
But of a thing that parfit is and stable,
Descending so, til it be corrumpable.—Id. Ib. v. 3012.

Corrupt was all this world for glotonie.
Id. The Pardoneres Tale, v. 12,438.

The pipes of his longes gan to swell,
And every lacerte in his brest adoun
Is shent with venime and corruptioun.
Id. The Knightes Tale, v. 2756.

For the elementes ben scrutinable
To man, and ofte of accidence,
As men male see the experience,
Thei ben corrupt by sondrie weye.—Gower. Con. A. b. v.

Nay that is not faith, but rather a folish blind opinion springing of their owne corrupt nature, and is not giue them of the spirite of God, but rather the spirite of the deuill.
Tyndall. Workes, p. 379.

She should haue bene broght into an high mountaine, & there tarone down headlõges, her corruptour being biheaded.—Bale. English Votaries, pt. i.

As though all the false religion that ever was amonge the heathen, was not a corrupting & deprauation of the true religiõ of God.—Calvine. Foure Godlye Sermons, Ser. 1.

Alas! Master Pole, what lack of learning & prudence was this, so corruptly to judg the matter; without al respect of time & person, so foolishly it to handle!
Strype. Rec. No. 8. Starky to Pole.

Hight Lopes he, that was for physick's skill,
Highly respected in the princes grace,
Corrupted was her loued life to spill.
Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 858.

No, doubtless: for the mind can backward cast
Upon herself, her understanding's light;
But she is so corrupt, and so defac'd
As her own image doth herself affright.
Davies. Immortality of the Soul, Introd.

They knew them to be the main corruptors at the king's elbow; they knew the king to have been always their most attentive scholar and imitator, and of a child to have suck'd from them and their closet-work all the impotent principles of tyranny and superstition.—Milton. Ans. to Eikon Basilike.

Yet can I not my loue haue nathemore:
For, she by force is still from me detayned,
And with corruptfull bribes is to untruth mistrayned.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. v. c. 11.

No dare looke up with corruptible eye,
On the dread face of that great DEITIE.
Spenser. Hymn of Heauenly Beautie.

Hen. It is too late, the life of all his blood
Is touch'd, corruptibly.—Shakes. King John, Act v. sc. 7.

But besides their innumerable corruptings of the fathers' writings; their thrusting in that which was spurious, and like Pharaoh, killing the legitimate sons of Israel, though in this, &c.—Bp. Taylor. A Dissuasive from Popery, c. i. s. i.

The enducing and accelerating of putrefaction, is a subject of a very universall enquiry: for corruption is a reciprocall to generation, and they two, are as natures two terms or boundaries; and the guides to life and death.
Bacon. Natural History, § 328.

Whosoever is found variable, and changeth manifestly, without manifest cause, giveth suspicion of corruption.
Id. Ess. Of Great Place.

Which is so far from being verefied of animals in their corruptive mutations into plants, that they maintain not their similitude in their nearer translation into animals.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. ii. c. 6.

In good sooth, this is no true dealing. No maruell it is that you haue not sette downe my booke, seeing you deale thus corruptely with it.—Whitgift. Defence, p. 89.

And considering thus with myselfe that the end of a lawfull and righteous government, is the profit and welfare of obedient subjects, I have beene evermore, as ye know, inclined to peece and quietnesse, banishing from mine acts and proceedings all licentious libertie, the corruptrice of states, and manners both.—Holland. Ammianus, p. 306.

He [Cato the Elder] procured in the senate, that Carneades the Academic, and Diogenes the Stoic, embassadors from Athens, should immediately be dismiss'd, that they might not corrupt the youth.—Bentley. Free-thinking.

Want of exercise is a great prejudice to their health, and a corrupter of their minds, by raising vapours and melancholy, that fills many with dark thoughts, rendering religion, which affords the truest joy, a burthen to them, and making them even a burthen to themselves.
Burnet. Own Time, vol. iv. Conclusion.

Or (darker prospect! scarre one gleam behind
Disclosing) should the broad corruptive plague
Breathe from the city to the furthest hut,
That sits serene within the forest shade.
Thomson. Liberty, pt. v.

——— Then with the spoil
Of cassia, cynamon, and stems of nard,
(For softness strew'd beneath) his funeral bed is rear'd:
The borders with corruptless myrrh are crown'd.
Dryden. Ovid. Metam. b. xv.

A reward, which nothing but that necessity which the consumption of my little estate in these wild pursuits had brought upon me, hindered me from throwing back in the face of my corruptor.—Rambler, No. 28.

They systematically corrupt a very corruptible race (for some time a growing nuisance amongst you) a set of pert petulant literators, to whom instead of their proper, but severe, unostentatious duties, they assign the brilliant part of men of wit and pleasure, of gay, young, military sparks, and danglers at toilets.
Burke. To a Member of the National Assembly.

That the frequency of elections proposed by this bill has a tendency to increase the power and consideration of the electors, not lessen corruptibility, I do most readily allow; so far it is desirable.—Id. Duration of Parliaments.

CO'RSAIR. "Fr. Corsaire or coursaire; a courser, a rover, a pyrate, a sea-thief." (Cotgrave.)

A course not without danger, as well in respect of the Turks' corsaires, as likewise smallness of the vessels prepar'd for transport of passengers.
Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 652.

Long mourn'd his band, whom none could mourn beside;
And fair the monument they gave his bride:
For him they raise not the recording stone—
His death yet dubious, deeds too widely known;
He left a corsair's name to other times,
Link'd with one virtue, and a thousand crimes.
Ld. Byron. Corsair, c. 3. s. 24.

CORSE, n. }
Co'RSELET, v. }
Co'RSELET, n. } Or Corps, (qv.) A body, a mere body; i. e. a lifeless, a dead body or carcass.

Corselet,—to cover the body.

For Corse-present, see the quotation from Blackstone.

That ye sayd li. deed corses were drawē downe the steyers without pytie, and layed in ye court that all men myght beholde that myserable spectacle.—Fabyan. K. John, an. 8.

The 20. day we manned our fiue boats, and also a great boat of the Frenchmen's with our men and the admirals, 12 of them in their murrains and corselets, and the rest all well appoynted.—Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 39.

Soone as the royall virgin he did spy,
With gaping mouth at her ran greedily,
To haue attonce deuour' her tender corse.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. i. c. 3.

1 Qu. The more proclaiming
Our suit shall be neglected, when her arms,
Able to knock Jove from a synod, shall
By warranting moon-light corslet thee.
Beaum. & Fletch. Two Noble Kinsmen, Act i. sc. 1.

Oh, it was a noble sight to behold the tent of Timoleon the general, how they environed it all about with heaps of spoiles of every sort: among which there were a thousand brave corselets gilt and graven with marvellous curious works, and they brought thither with them also ten thousand targets.—North. Plutarch, p. 233.

——— From his void embrace,
Mysterious heaven! that moment, to the ground,
A blacken'd corse, was struck the beauteous maid.
Thomson. Summer.

He said, and pois'd in air the javelin sent,
Through Paris' shield the forceful weapon went,
His corselet pierces, and his garment rends,
And, glancing downward, near his flank descends.
Pope. Homer. Iliad, b. iii.

It was anciently usual in this kingdom to bring the mortuary to church along with the corpse, when it came to be buried; and hence it is sometimes called a corse-present; a term which bespeaks it to have been once a voluntary donation.—Blackstone. Commentaries, vol. ii. p. 425.

CO'RSNED. "A. S. Corsned; offa execrata, alias, judicialis; from Cors, (curse,) execratio, maledictio, and sned vel snid, offa, bolus. A piece of bread, first by the priest execrated, and then offered to the suspected, guilty person, to be swallowed in a way of purgation." (Somner.) But this bread was also called Ned-bread, i. e. need-bread; the bread which it was needful for the suspected person to take, which he was compelled to take. The form of the Exorcismus may be seen in Spelman's Glossarium, p. 439.

Another species of purgation, somewhat similar to the former, but probably sprung from a presumptuous abuse of revelation in the ages of dark superstition, was the corsned or morsel of execration: being a piece of cheese or bread, of about an ounce in weight, which was consecrated with a form of exorcism: desiring of the Almighty that it might cause convulsions and paleness, and find no passage if the man was really guilty; but might turn to health and nourishment, if he was innocent.
Blackstone. Commentaries, vol. iv. p. 345.

CO'RTEX. }
Co'RTICAL. }
Co'RTICATED. } Lat. Cortex, ex corium et tego; quia quasi corium tegat; because it covers like a hide. See Vossius.

The bark or rind, the outward covering, (the cork, qv.)

It being necessary for them that they be furnished not only with what preparations were required in the other, but also with a special hardiness of enduring to see the cortex of the Mosaick letter, as it were to break in pieces, to render up thus recondite kernal for them to feed upon.
More. Philosophic Cabbala, App. c. 6.

Much after the same manner, as they have been observed, in the cortical and medullary parts of the brain.
Grew. Cosmo. Sacra, b. i. c. 5.

Which [the salamander] is a kind of lizard, a quadruped corticated and depilous, that is, without wool, fur or hair.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iii. c. 14

This tree grows on the tops of hills, as well as in valleys; its hard cortical part makes very durable laths for houses.
Granger. The Sugar Cane, b. iv. v. 523. Note.

CO'RVEN. See Carve.

CO'RVORANT. The Cormorant, (qv.) so called. Corvus marinus.

We know that the otter, the corvorant, and the grebes, soon perish, if caught under ice, or entangled in nets.
Pennant. British Zoology. Swallows.

And the two last also frequent the sound. They are of the common sorts; the shags being our corvorant or watercrow.—Cooke. Voyage, vol. vi. b. iv. c. 2.

CO'RUSCATE, v. }
Co'RUSCANT, adj. }
Coruscа'tion. } Lat. Coruscare, atum, to glitter. Martinius thinks from Gr. Κορυς, galea, a helmet, quæ splendida erat.

To glitter, to flash, dart, throw forth or emit, rays or sparks of light.

His praises are like those coruscant beams
Which Phœbus on high rocks of cristal streames.
Howell, b. iv. Let. 49.

That if burning-glasses could be brought to great strength, (as they talk generally of burning-glasses that are able to burn a navy,) the percussion of the air alone, by such a burning-glass, would make no noise; no more than is found in coruscations, and lightnings without thunders.
Bacon. Naturall History, § 121.

As flaming fire was more coruscating and enlightening than any other matter, they invented lamps to hang in the sepulchres of the rich, which would burn perpetually.
Greenhill. Art of Embalming, p. 331.

But if I did press hard upon it with my finger, at the very instant that I drew it briskly off, it would disclose a very vivid, but exceeding short livid splendor, not to call it a little coruscation.—Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 798.

Should any man pursue his acquaintances to their retreats, he would find few of them listening to Philomel, loitering in woods, or plucking daisies, catching the healthy gale of the morning, or watching the gentle coruscations of declining day.—Rambler, No. 135.

COSCINOMANCY. Gr. Κοσκινο-μαντις; "She who tells fortunes with the sieve and shears." Fawkes, (Theocritus, Id. iii.) from κοσκινον, a sieve, and μαντις, a diviner.

See the quotation.

And that ordinary way of divination, which they call coskinomancy, or finding who stole or spoiled this or that thing by the sieve and shears, Pictorius Vigilianus professeth he made use of thrice, and it was with success.
More. Antidote against Atheism, b. ii. c. 2

COSME'TICK, adj. } Gr. Κοσμος, ornatus, adorned. Gr. Κοσμητης; Lat. Cometa, (which in Juvenal, vi. 477, is rendered by Holliday, "The tiring maids.")

That which can or may, that which is used to, adorn, deck, beautify.

Evelyn (Fop. Dict.) says,—here used for any effeminate ornament. Also, artificial complexions and perfumes.

The learned Vossius says, his barber us'd to comb his head in lambicks. And indeed in all ages, one of this useful profession, this order of cosmetick philosophers, has been celebrated by the most eminent hands.—Tatler, No. 34.

No better cosmeticks than a severe temperance and purity, a real and unaffected modesty and humility, a gracious temper and calmness of spirit, a sincere and universal charity. No true beauty without the signatures of these graces in the very countenance.—Ray. On the Creation, pt ii.

Sir, may I be so happy as to see again some lines from your hands, to continue or rather begin a correspondence, as to the cosmetical (but to my mine truly vital, parts of it.
Boyle. Works, vol. vi. p. 77. From Hartwell, an. 1647.

I was never permitted to sleep till I had passed through the cosmetick discipline, part of which was a regular lustration performed with bean flower water and May-dews.
Rambler, No. 130.

This oil [of the cashew] is used as a cosmetick by the ladies to remove freckles and sun burning; but the pain they necessarily suffer makes its use not very frequent.
Granger. The Sugar Cane, Note on v. 137.

Cudworth coins the compound Cosmolatry, to denote—world-idolatry.

For, the world, which the Greekes by the name of ornament, called κοσμος, wee for the perfect neatnesse and absolute elevancie thereof, have tearmed Mundus.
Holland. Pliny, b. ii. c. 4.

First, your lordship knoweth that the cosmographers haue dlunded the earth by 360 degrees of latitude, and as many in longitude, vnder the which is comprehended all the roundnes of the earth.—Hacklugt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 215.

I and my partener haue one thousand foure hundred duckets that we employed in the sayde fleete, principally for that two English men friends of mine, which are somewhat learned in cosmographie, should goe in the same shippes, to bring me certaine relation of the situation of the country, and to be expert in the naugation of those seas.—Id. Ib.

I haue often times (sayd he) and many wayes looked into the state of earthly kingdomes, generally the whole world over, (as farre as it may be yet knowen to Christian men commonly) being a studie of no great difficultie, but rather a purpose somewhat answerable to a perfect cosmographer, to finde himselfe cosmopolites, a citizen and member of the whole and onely one mysticall citie universall, and so consequently to meditate of the cosmopolitical gouernment thereof, vnder the King almightie, passing on very swiftly toward the most dreadful and most comfortable terme prefixed.—Id. Ib. vol. i. p. 6.

If therefore the dog-star had this effectuall heat which is ascribed unto it, it would afford best evidence thereof and the season would be most fervent, when it ariseth in the probablest place of its activity, that is, the cosmical ascent; for therein it ariseth with the sun, and is included in the same irradiation.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iv. c. 13.

This name hath bene taken vp in honour of Saint Swithin, the holie bishop of Winchester about the yeare 860, and called the Weeping Saint Swithin, for that about his feast Præsepe and Aselli, rainie constellations do arise cosmically, and commonly cause raine.—Camden. Remaines. Names.

It was a most ancient and in a manner universally received tradition amongst the Pagans, as hath often been intimated, that the cosmogonia or generation of the world took its first beginning from a chaos, (the divine cosmogonists agreeing herein with the Atheistick ones;) this tradition having been delivered down from Orpheus and Linus (among the Greeks) by Hesiod, and Homer, and others.

Howell, b. i. s. 6. Let. 60.

We insist largely, upon an artificial, regular, and plastick nature, devoid of express knowledge and understanding, as subordinate to the Deity: chiefly in way of confutation, of those cosmoplastick, and hylozoick atheisms.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, Pref. p. 10

I shall express what I call general nature by cosmical mechanism, that is, a comprisal of all the mechanical affections (figure, size, motion, &c.) that belong to the matter of the great system of the universe.—Boyle. Works, vol. v. p. 178.

We shall pass by what a cosmographer would perhaps except against in his doctrine about the generation and motion of the wind upon the surface of the earth, and shall only take notice in the remaining part of that section of thus much.—Id. Ib. vol. ii. p. 693.

Now the proper introduction, as well as foundation and support, of this kind of history, is a theistical cosmogony.
Warburton. The Divine Legation, b. iii. s. 3.

Certain it is, that, according to the Hebrew cosmologist, the earth was, before the six days' creation, a desolate waste.

CO'SSET, n. A cosset is said, in the Glosse to the Shepheard's Calendar, November, to be "a lambe brought up without the dam." Florio has "Casiccio, cassiccio, a tame lamb bred up by hand in a house." (Casa, a cottage.) To the same purport are Ray and Grose. Moor (Suffolk Words and Phrases) adds, that the term is extended to a much indulged child. "'Twas cossetted too much by half."

The fairest May she was that euer went,
Her like she has not left behind I weene.
And if thou wilt bewail my wofull teene,
I shall thee giue yond cosset for thy paine.

COST, v. } Ger. and Dut. Kost; Ger. Kosten; Sw. Kosta; Fr. Coustes; It. Costare, which the etymologists, with the exception of Junius, derive from the Lat. Constare. Junius thinks the A. S. Cyste, arca, a chest, is the primitive word; quod majores impensas facturi opus habeant arcâ, eâque bene instructâ. In Scotch, to cose, or to coss, Dr. Jamieson says, is to exchange, to barter; and this Ruddiman, in his Glossary to G. Douglas, derives from the A. Betwixt the coasts of a ship, and sinks it streight.
B. Jonson. Staple of Newes, Act iii. sc. 2.

Whereby are excluded all cetaceous and cartilagineous fishes; many pectinal, whose ribs are rectilineal; many costal, which have their ribs embowed; all spinal, or such as have no ribs, but onely a back bone.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iv. c. 10.

CO'STARD, n. } A costard is said by the old lexicons to be a kind of apple. Drayton (Poly-Olbion, s. 18) mentions it among the sundry fruits, "That have their sundry names in sundry countries plac'd." And it is classed by Evelyn among those in prime in October. Coster or costard-monger, is explained to be a fruiterer in general. Skinner derives costard from coster, a head; but there is no authority for such a word. Honeywood (in Skinner) from Dut. Kost, cibus, and

COTE, n.
COT, n.
COTSWOLD.
COTTAGED, adj.
COTTAGELY.
COTTAGER.
COTTER, or
COTTIER. } "A. S. Cote, domuncula, casa, tugurium, a cote, a cottage; such as that we call a sheep-cote, or the like, forensi nostratium latinitate cota, cotta, cottagium, it. spelunca, cubile, sella. A denne, a cave, a bed, a couch, a nest," (Somner.) In A. S. it is also written Cyte. Spelman says, primarie a Graeco κοιτη, cubile, lustrum ferarum. Verstegan (see the quotation from him) seems to think that cote (coat), a garment, may have been transferred from cot = as to the little house or cote of the body. The common origin may be the Ger. Kutten, tegere, to cover, to protect; and thus, cot, cote, or coat, may mean—

Any thing which covers, shelters or protects the human or any other body,—whether applied to a small place for men to dwell or rest in, or for the shelter and protection of sheep, pigeons, or other animals.

Stand in his way, the coates, and eke the herdes.
Surrey. Virgile. Æneis, b. ii.

At the concludyng of whiche amitie he granted lycence and libertie for certayn cotteshold shepe to be transported into the countie of Spayne (as people report) which haue so there multiplied and encreased that it hath turned y^e commoditie of England, moche to the Spanish profit, & to no small hynderance of the luere and gayne whiche was beforetymes in England, raysed of wolle and fell.
Hall. Edw. IV. an. 4.

Moche rather is that servaunt to be commended, whiche haulinge a lyttell reward of his mayster, wyll in a small cotage make hym hartye chere, with moche humble reuerence.—Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. iii. c. 2.

And albeit a cote in our language is a little slight built country habitation (such as after the French we call a cottage) yet as all things begin little, so that which first bore the name of a cote, might afterwards come to be the habitation of a worshipfull family, and yet retaine the name of cote still, which being no other originally in itselfe than is aforesaid, yet carrieth it honour in the antiquity thereof. We also use this word cote, for a garment, but it seemith to have been at first metaphorically brought in use, in regard of being shrouded therein, as in the little house or cote of the body, but anciently we so used it not, for our ancient word for a cote in this sence, was a reaf.
Verstegan. Restitution of Decayed Intelligence, c. 8.

Diuerse discourses in their way they spent;

Churchill. Independence.

There through the dusk but dimly seen,
Sweet evening objects intervene:
His wattled cotes the shepherd plants,
Beneath her elm the milk-maid chants.—Warton, Ode II.

Where'er from time thou court'st relief,
The muse shall still, with social grief,
Her gentlest promise keep:
Ev'n humble Harting's cottag'd vale,
Shall learn the sad repeated tale,
And bid her shepherds weep.
Collins. On the Death of Col. Ross.

Resolve me, why the cottager and king,
He whom sea-sever'd realms obey, and he
Who steals his own dominions from the waste,
Repelling winter blasts with mud and straw,
Disquieted alike, draw sigh for sigh,
In fate so distant, in complaint so near?
Young. Complaint, Night 7.

COTE. "To cote, is to overtake. In the laws of coursing, Mr. Tollett says, 'To cote is when a greyhound goes endways by the side of his fellow, and gives the hare a turn.' This quotation seems to point out the etymology of the verb to be from the Fr. Côté, the side," (Steevens.)

"Fr. Coste a coste,—equally, in even rank, side by side, cheek by jowl," (Cotgrave.)

She, of the gods and goddesses
Before the wanton noted,

Rosin. To thinke, my lord, if you delight not in man, what lenton entertainment the players shall receive from you: we coted them on the way, and hither are they comming to offer you service.—Shakespeare. Hamlet, Act ii. sc. 2.

COTERIE. Fr. Coterie, company, society, association of people. Menage writes Cotereux, coterie; Mid. Lat. Coterellus; and this he, with Spelman, thinks is from the Low Lat. Cota, a cot; cotæ seu tugurii habitator. (See Menage, Du Cange, Spelman, and Vossius, de Vitus.) Skinner has "Cottarelli, clientes seu beneficiarii omnium vilissimi, a nostro cote." See also Cotterie in Cotgrave, for the earlier usage of the word.

Fine B—— observes no other rules
Than those the coterie prise;
She thinks, whilst lords continue fools
'Tis vulgar to be wise.—Lovibond. On a very fine Lady.

COTQUEAN. Mr. Gifford says, is a corruption of Cuck-quean, (qv.) a woman whose husband is unfaithful to her bed. But in Hall it is evidently applied as explained in Philips's New World of Words, quoted by the editor of Hall's works: viz. "A man that is too busy in meddling with women's affairs." See also the citation below from the Spectator.

Scold like a cot-queane, that's your profession.
Ford. 'Tis Pity She's a Whore, Act i. sc. 2.

CO'UCHER.
CO'UCHING, n.

Dut. Koetsen; Ger. Kutschen; Fr. Coucher, which latter Junius thinks is from the It. Colcare, pro collocare; for colcarsi Italis est conferre se in cubitum, collocare se in lecto. And see a collection of similar usages of the verb, collocare, in Menage. Vossius (de Vitiis) says, Culea, pro quo nunc eliso L, pronuntiant, couche. And see COACH.

The Dut. and Ger. are derived by Wachter from Kutten, to cover (see COT); for what, he asks, is kutsche, (a coach, qv.) but a covered vehicle or carriage? To couch and to cower have similar applications, and probably the same origin. (See COWER, and COVE.) To Couch is—

To lay, or lye, down; to lower, to stoop, to bend down; to set, or put or place, to press low, down, flat; to deject, to depress; to depose, to repose;—to lie or lay hidden; to lurk; to hide, to cover, to cloak, to clothe, to invest.

Coucher,—one who couches; one who lies, (sc.) in wait, or on watch, or on duty. The word in the latter usage occurs in Stat. 37 Edw. III. c. 16. (See in Rastal, fol. 535.)

"Couched with perles,—laid or trimmed with perles," (Tyrwhitt.)

Couch is used, by Wiclif, as equivalent to chamber. (or cot.)

A covenant to do any action at a certain time or place is then dissolved by the covenanter, when that time cometh, either by the performance or by the violation.
Hobbes. De Corpore Politico, pt. i. c. 2.

All covenants are dischargeable by the covenantee, to whose benefit, and by whose right, he that maketh the covenant is obliged. This right, therefore, of the covenantee relinquished, is a release of the covenant.—Id. Ib.

I am sorry to hear of new oathes in Scotland between the covenanters, who they say will have none but Jesus Christ to reign over them; a sacred cover of the deepest impiety.
Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 580.

Whereof the number in any one house is or of late hath been less than a covent, that is to say, under thirteen persons.—Strype. Memorials. Hen. VIII. an. 1536.

At least such subtle covenants shall be made,
Till peace itself is war in masquerade.
Dryden. Absalom & Achitophel.

We must first, by our holy lives, make ourselves objects of his mercy; if we do that, Christ will save us. But without our own endeavours, the gospel covenant is of no effect.
Gilpin, vol. i. Ser. 1.

CO'VER, v. Co'VER, s. Co'VERCLE. Co'VERER. Co'VERING, s. Co'VERLET. Co'VERT, s. Co'VERT, adj. Co'VERTLESS. Co'VERTLY. Co'VERTURE. Fr. Couvrir; It. Coprire; Sp. Cubrir. Manifestly, says Junius, from Co-operire, (con, and operire, from ob, and parere.) The origin, perhaps, is the A. S. Ge-uf-an, ge-uf-er—over; to put or place over.

To put, place, or lay over, on, against; to overlay, (sc.) so as to hide or conceal, to shelter or protect; and thus, consequentially, to hide, to cloak, to secrete, to conceal, to shelter, to protect.

Gower uses covereth, (met.) as equivalent to re-covereth.

Coverlit,—Fr. Couvre-lict; It. Copraletto; so called a cooperiendo lectum; from covering the bed, or couch.

Let us make the assay vpon him, if he care not for't, he will supply vs easily: if he couetously reserue it, how shall's get it?—Shakespeare. Timon of Athens, Act iv. sc. 3.

In like manner the more the coretous man increaseth his estate, the more his desires are enlarged and extended, and he finds continually new occasions and new necessities; and every day as he grows richer, he discovers new wants: and a new poverty to be provided against, which he did not think of before, comes into his mind: et minus hæc optat, qui non habet: and he that is without these things coveis them less than he that hath them.—Tillotson, vol. ii. Ser. 37.

Now riches were an admirable thing indeed, and worth our coveting, if they would help to cure these distempers of our minds, but they are the least fitted for such a purpose of any thing in the world; for not he that hath the greatest estate, but he that hath the fewest and most reasonable desires, and the best governed passions and the most virtuous inclinations, is the happiest man, and dwells nearest to satisfaction.—Id. Ib. Ser. 33.

The word in Greek is πλεονεξία, which properly signifies covetousness, or an intemperate ungovern'd love of riches.

COUNSELLING, n.
COUNSELLOR.
COUNSELLORSHIP.

Council appears to be now restricted in its application to a body or assembly of persons met together, to consult, advise or deliberate. Our older writers wrote the word variously, Council, councel, counsel.

Council is used in composition as—council-board, council-chamber.

Counsel is applied to advice, consultation, deliberation, design, plan or purpose; and also (elliptically) to him, who is of counsel, who gives counsel or advice, who aids or assists in consultation or deliberation, in forming plans or designs; to the counsellor or adviser; and, technically, to the pleader or advocate. And see the quotation from Hobbes.

And in fourty nyght hy byluede there aboute
And conseylde of batayle, & ordeynede her route.
R. Gloucester, p. 359.

Beware therefore of men, for they shall deliuer you vp to their counseils, and they shall scourge you in their sinagoges or counseil-houses.—Tyndall. Workes, p. 214.

In the name of the Lord so be it. There was put forth before us the deane and college of the right counsailful facultie of decrees of the vniuersitie of Parys this question.
Hall. Hen. VIII. an. 8.

I have not therefore, I confess, read more of the councils save here and there; I should be sorry to have been such a prodigal in my time: if ye provoke me (for at no hand else will I undertake such a frivolous labour) I will in three months be an expert councilist.
Milton. Apology for Smectymnuus.

Sitting in councell with his companions in the councell-house at Athens about the dispatch of certain causes, he [Nicias] spake unto Sophocles the poet, then present among them, and bad him speak first and say his opinion, being the oldest man of the whole company.—North. Plutarch, p. 458.

In matters of spiritual joy and sorrow, I will if I can, be counseled by a heart which once was broken, that I may see how he recovered, and repair my breaches by a pattern.
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 628.

Counsel, is where a man saith, Do, or do not, this, and deduceth his reasons from the benefit that arriveth by it to him to whom he saith it.—Hobbs. Commonwealth, c. 25.

He [the Earl of Strafford] moved the lords to have counsel allowed him, which was much opposed by the commons, but his accusation having much in it of matter of law, he had permission to have counsel.—Baker. Charles I. an. 1646.

I would to Jove, Athenia, and Phoebus, I could make
(Of all) but ten such counsellors; then instantly would shake
King Priam's city, by our hands laid hold on, and laid waste. Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. ii.

For the great offices and officers of the kingdom, I shall say little; for the most part of them are such as cannot well be severed from the counsellorship; and therefore the same rule is to be observed for both, in the choice of them.
Bacon. Advice to Sir George Villars.

To prevent which outrage, by gentle messages intreating of the barons a place and day of meeting, who thereto designed Running-mead (since called Counsell-mead, for such consultations of state.)—Speed. K. John, b. ix. c. 8.

Or teach with more success her son
The vices of the times to shun.
Id. Epitaph on Sir George Speke.

The danger of their marching in his rear, and carrying as great an addition of strength to the enemy, as General Goring could carry to the king, except he carried with him the forces of several garrisons, which were then joyn'd to him, made it very counsellable to suspend a present obedience to those orders, till his majesty might receive the full and true state of his affairs in those parts.
Clarendon. History, vol. ii. p. 662.

Very few men of so great parts were, upon all occasions, more counsellable than he [Lord Digby]; so that he would seldom be in danger of running into great errors, if he would communicate and expose all his own thoughts and inclinations to such a disquisition.—Id. Ib. vol. i. p. 344.

Mr. Hyde asked me one day in the council-chamber why I came so seldom in the house of council; I told him, it was upon Solomon's advice, neither to oppose the mighty, nor go about to stop the current of a river.
Sir W. Temple. Memoirs, an. 1679.

As if it were not more advantageous to mankind to be instructed in wisdom and virtue, than in politicks; and to be made good fathers, husbands, and sons, than counsellours and statesmen.—Spectator, No. 124.

False to my word—or faithless to my trust;
Bid me the banefull errour, counsell'd see,
And shun the world, to find repose with thee.
Boyse. Address to Poverty.

CO-UNDERSTA'NDING. A mutual or reciprocal understanding.

I cannot yet get that grammar, which was made for the constable of Castile, who you know was born dumb; wherein an art is invented to speak with hands only, to carry the alphabet upon ones joints and at his fingers ends, which may be learned without any great difficulty by any mean capacity, and whereby one may discourse and deliver the conceptions of his mind without ever wagging of his tongue, provided there be reciprocal knowledge, and co-understanding of the art twixt the parties, and it is a very ingenious piece of invention.—Howell, b. ii. Let. 71

I take it, she that carries vp the traine,
Is that old noble lady, Dutchesse of Norfolke.
1. It is, and all the rest are countesses.
2. Their coronets say so.—Id. Hen. VIII. Act iv. sc. 1.

Each [division] contained a hundred freemen, who were subject to an officer called the centenarius; a number of which centenarii were themselves subject to a superior officer, called the count or comes.—Shire is a Saxon word, signifying a division: but a county, comitatus, is plainly derived from comes, the count of the Franks; that is the earl, or alderman (as the Saxons called him) of the shire, to whom the government of it was intrusted.
Blackstone Commentaries, Introd. s. 4

All these provincial generals were dukes; but no more than ten among them were dignified with the rank of counts, or companions, a title of honour or rather of favour, which had been recently invented in the court of Constantine.

Co'UNTENANCING, s. }

The continence, keeping or composure of the features of the face; the composure or settledness of face, looks or aspect; generally, the look, or aspect: further, the firm or fixed aspect of confidence, of assurance, of courage, of encouragement; and thus applied to—

Encouragement, support, power, patronage. And, to countenance—

To encourage, to support, to favour, to patronise.

In Every Man out of his Humour, upon the expression, 'I'll give you more than countenance," Mr. Gifford has this note. "Countenance is a law term, from the Fr. Contenement, or the Lat. Contenementum, and denotes the credit and reputation which a person hath by reason of his freehold; and most commonly what is necessary for his support and maintenance according to his condition of life." (Observations on the more Ancient Statutes, p. 11.)

You cannot imagine, as you have not been long enough in your post to know it by your own observation, how great an advantage it is to a man to have the countenance of the governor of his province.—Melmoth. Cicero. b. i. Let. 13.

CO'UNTER, ad. Fr. Contre; Lat. Contra. Against, in opposition, in resistance, contrariwise.

A hound that runs counter, and yet draws dryfoot well.
Shakespeare. Comedy of Errors, Act iv. sc. 2.

For that punishment follows not in this life, the breach of this rule, and consequently that it has not the force of a law in countries, where the generally allow'd practice runs counter to it, is in itself evident.—Locke. Hum. Und. b. i. c. 3.

CO'UNTER,—Is very much used (as the Lat. Contra, qv.) in composition; and it may be so used, either adverbially or adjectively, with any word, when contrariety or opposition is intended. For many of our own compounds we are perhaps indebted to the French. e.g. Contre-ballancer, -changer, -chanter, -gage, -garde, -mander, -miner, -peser, -poison, -scarpe, -signer, -sceller. An instance or two will be subjoined; and from them, all that may at any time occur will receive a formula of explanation. When Counter stands before a noun sub., whether separate or prefixed, it is in its manner of signification an adjective; before a verb or adjective it is an adverb. A Counter-poise, is a poise or weight; counter, opposed to, put or set against, an other weight. To counter-poise, is to poise or weigh oppositely or against an other weight. Some words have received a usage consequential upon the effect of the contrariety or opposition, as in the instances following of Counteract and Counterfeit.

COUNTRY. Co'UNTRIFY. } Fr. Contrée; It. and Sp. Contrada; Dut. Kontreye. Spelman,—Contrata. Patria, Italic. a con, id est, simul, et strada, via, quasi regio vel tractus in quem plures congrediuntur. Skinner. Q.d. Lat. Conterrata, i. e. tractus terrarum proximè invicem sitarum, vel, ut nos loquimur, adjacentium. Contrata, in Low Lat. appears to have been a common word. Others say from Contracta (See Menage, and Du Cange.) But may it not owe its origin, to the A. S. Cunn-an, parere, to bear or bring forth; and denote—

The land that bears the paternal land, (patria)?

A space, a tract, a region of land; applied also, to the inhabitants collectively. Opposed to the town; also, to the court.

It is much used in composition,—as country-man, country-house.

Ful wel beloved, and familier was he
With frankeleins over all in his contree.
Chaucer. Prologue, v. 216.

In countries some must rule, some must obey, euery man may not beare lyke stroke, for euerye man is not lyke wise.
Sir J. Cheke. The Hurt of Sedition.

Wherefore the gouernours, in the stede of physitions attendynge on their cure, oughte to knowe the causes of the decay of theyr publike weale, whiche is the healthe of theyr countrey or cytie, and than with expedition to procede to the mooste spedy and sure remedy.
Sir T. Elyot. Governour, b. iii. c. 25.

I might haue learn'd this by my last exile
That change of countries cannot change my state;
Where euer that my bodie seeke a seate,
I leaue my heart in Albion's glorious yle.
Sterling. Aurora, s. 56.

And you! brave Cobham, to the latest breath,
Shall feel your ruling passion strong in death.
Such in those moments, as in all the past,
"Oh, save my country, heaven," shall be your last.
Pope. Moral Essays, Epis. 1.

God made the country, and man made the town.
What wonder then that health and virtue, gifts,
That can alone make sweet the bitter draught,
That life holds out to all, should most abound
And least be threaten'd in the fields and groves.
Cowper. Task, b. ii.

Well to be sure it must be own'd
It is a charming spot of ground;
So sweet a distance for a ride,
And all about so countrified.—Lloyd. The Cit's Country Box.

But though she ne'er adorn'd his brows,
She had a vast contempt for spouse,
As being one who took no pride,
And was a deal too countrified.—Id. Temple of Favour

CO'UPLE, v. Co'UPLE, n. Co'UPLEMENT. Co'UPLET, n. Co'UPLING, n. } Fr. Coupler, accoupler; It. Accopiare; Lat. Copulare, atum, to brace together. COURAGE, v.
CO'URAGE, adj.
COURA'GEOUS.
COURA'GEOUSLY.
COURA'GEOUSNESS.

Fr. Courage, It. Coraggio; Sp. Corage. Cordis actio, says Minshew. Q.d. coratio seu cordatio, i. e. cordis robur et erectio, (Skinner.)

Courage, the verb, is used in our old writers as we use encourage; and the noun, as encouragement. (See ENCOURAGE.) Courage, the noun, is applied to—

A hearty desire, a hearty devotedness, a deep fixed resolution: as distinguished from fortitude, it is applied to express a more active spirit of bravery, of boldness, daring, or hardihood.

Dr. Cogan observes, "Courage is active fortitude. It meets dangers, and attempts to repel them." And see the quotation from Hobbes.

Harald, a man wyth grete herte corageus y non.
R. Gloucester, p. 359.

But though this mayden tendre were of age,
Yet in the brest of hire virginitee
There was enclosed sad and ripe corage.
Chaucer. The Clerkes Tale, v. 8096.

Befelle, that, in that seson on a day,
In Southwerk at the Tabard as I lay,
Redy to wenden on my pilgrimage
To Canterbury with deuot corage.—Id. The Prol. v. 22

Were it for holinesse or for dotage,
I cannot sain, but swiche a gret corage
Hadde this knight to ben a wedded man,
That day and night he doth all that he can
To espien, wher that he might wedded be.
Id. The Marchantes Tale, v. 9130.

Of man's herte the courage
Was shewed then in the visage.—Gower. Con. A. Prol.

Thou mayst see how diligently (as a mother careth for her child if it be in perill) Paule writeth vnto Timothy to instruct him, to teach hym, to exhort, to courage hym, to stirre him vp, to be wise, sober, diligent, circumspect, sad, humble, and meeke.—Tyndall. Workes, p. 252.

Moreouer charge Josua, and courage him & bolden him
Bible, 1551. Deuteronomie, c. 3.

Thus the warre was renewed, wherby many great myschyefes haue fallen, to the distruction of moche people and countreys, and the faythe of Christ so febled and decayed, and the enemyes of God rysen and corraged.
Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. ii. c. 204.

Likewise as of men, he who so is most like stomacked vnto a woman, nor lusty couraged, wil remember iniurie longest, and seeke for vengeance most violently, nor can be content with a meane reuenge vsaunced.
Vives. Instruction of a Christian Woman, b. iii. c. 5.

And alas my lord this is a piteous case, that having so much business as ye have, these inward disorders should be added unto them to the courage of such as would this realm any ways evil.—State Trials. Bp. Gardiner, an. 1551.

O most couragious youth, how much the more thou dost receede
In valient herte: so much the more 'tis meete I shuide indeede
Giue graue aduice, and charely for chaunces all prouide.
Phaer. Virgill. Æneidos, b. xii.

Then the Bretons closed togyder with grete courage, and pytched theyr speres and glayues in the erthe, and helde strongly theyr place, and fought couragyously.
Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. ii. c. 47.

This Henry yet, as wytnessyth Ranulfe, was not all bareyn of vertues, for he was of so great courageousness, yt he wolde often saye yt all the worlde suffyseyth not to a coragyous harte.—Fabyan, vol. i. c. 236.

Thou shalt warne the elders of the people that they be sobre, watchful and diligent to all godly workes. And that they ouercome the vnlustyness of their age with the courageousness of faith.—Udal. Titus, c. 2.

For thy great wonder were it, if such shame
Should euer enter in his bounteous thought,
Or euer doe that mote deseruen blame:
The noble courage neuer weeneth ought,
That may vnworthy of it selfe be thought.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. iii. c. 2.

——— Theire discipline,

To their approuers, they are people, such
That mend vpon the world.—Shakes. Cymb. Act ii. sc. 4.

Sam. Be of good courage, I begin to feel
Some rouzing motions in me which dispose
Of something extraordinary my thoughts.
Milton. Samson Agonistes.

Courage, in a large signification, is the absence of fear in the presence of any evil whatsoever; but in a strict and more common meaning, it is contempt of wounds and death, when they oppose a man in a way to his end.
Hobbes. Humane Nature, c. 9.

With this victory the women became most courageous and proud, and the men waxed as disgracefull, fearefull, & desperate.—Stow. The West Saxons.

Yet since that other men's iniquity
Calls on the sword of wrath against my will,
And that themselves exact this cruelty,
And I constrained am this blood to spill:
Then on, brave followers; on courageously.
Daniel. History of Civil War, b. iv.

The self-same individuals that
Did run, as mice do from a cat,
When we courageously did wield
Our martial weapons in the field.—Hudibras, pt. i. c. 3.

To secure the honours which are bestowed upon courage by custom, it is indeed necessary that this danger should be voluntary: for a courageous resistance of dangers to which we are necessarily exposed by our station, is considered merely as the discharge of our duty, and brings only a negative reward, exemption from infamy.—Adventurer, No. 1.

Wouldst thou then raise thy patriot office higher,
To something more than magistrate aspire?
And left each poorer, pettier chace behind.
Step nobly forth, the friend of human kind?
The game I start courageously pursue.
Langhorne. The Country Justice.

COURIER. Fr. Courier; It. Corriere; Sp. Correo, from the Lat. Currere, to run.

A runner; a running messenger; generally, a messenger; also, a message.

The same Saturdaye the prince and his cõpany dyalaged fro a lyttell vyllage therby, and sent before hym certayn currours to se if they myght fynde any aduẽture, and to here where the Frẽchmen were
Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. i. c. 159.

But finding his defeat, his enterprize so lost,
He his swift couriers sends, to will his valiant brother,
And Oxford, in command being equal to the other,
To charge with the right wing who bravely up do bear.
Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 22.

Whereupon, he addressed aforehand his letters and courriers to the chiefe of the Barchine faction, to frame and prepare the minds of that side, so as they of the other part might not gratifie, or do any thing in favour of the Romanes
Holland. Livius, p. 398.

The court was resolved to expedite the passes in the very same form with that agreed upon by the confederates: and were absolutely of opinion, that the clause for liberty of couriers was necessary, and particularly as to themselves
Sir W. Temple. To Sir J. Williamson, Feb. 1676.

The most celebrated of these is the carrier, which from the superior attachment that pigeon shews to its native place is employed in many countries as the most expeditious courier: the letters are tied under its wings, it is let loose, and in a very short space of time returns to the home it was brought from with its advices.

But soone be catch'd by such a subtle snare.
Sterling. Doomes-Day. The Tenth Houre.

Of court, it seemes, men courteise do call
For that it there most vseth to abound;
And well beseemeth, that in princes hall
That vertue should be plentifully found,
Which of all goodly manners is the ground
And root of ciuil conversation.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. vi. c. 1.

The court's a school indeed, in whiche some few
Learn vertuous principles but most forget
What ever they brought thither good and honest.
Trifling is there in practice, serious actions
Are obsolete and out of use.

Or that in the garb he savours
Little of the nicety,
In the sprucer courtiery. B. Jonson. The Satyr.

For he is practis'd well in policie
And thereto doth his courting most apply:
To learne the enterdeale of princes strange,
To marke th' intent of counsells, and the change
Of states, and eke of priuate men some-while
Supplanted by fine falshood and faire guile.
Spenser. Mother Hubberd's Tale.

Cri. Indeed, I must declare myselfe to you no profest courtling; nor to have any excellent stroke, at your subtle weapons.—B. Jonson. Cynthia's Revels, Act v. sc. 4.

Dryden. Cymon & Iphigenia.

We cannot omit to observe this courtly, (shall I call it?) or good quality in him; that he was courteous, and did seem to study to oblige.—Strype. Mem. Hen. VIII. an. 1530.

I endeavoured to clothe virtue, though not in a gaudy, in a fashionable habit, and divesting her not only of her sackcloth, but her backs, where I saw she appeared in them with disadvantage, I endeavoured to give her as much of the modern ornaments of a fine lady, as I could, without danger of being accused to have dressed her like a courtezan.
Boyle. Occas. Reflections. Last Section, Reflect. 1.

Courtesy and condescension is another happy quality, which never fails to make its way into the good opinion, and into the very hearts of those who are under the good magistrate's inspection.—Atterbury, vol. ii. Ser. 3.

Now, Proteus! now (to truth compell'd)
Speak and confess thy art excell'd.
Use strength, surprise, or what you will,
The courtier finds evasion still;
Not to be bound by any ties,
And never forc'd to leave his lyes.
Gay, Fab. 33. The Courtier & Proteus.

The day would fail me, should I reckon o'er
The sighs they lavish'd, and the oths they swore
In words so melting, that compar'd with those
The nicest courtship of terrestrial beaux
Would sound like compliments from country clowns
To red cheek'd sweet-hearts in their home-spun gowns.
Tickell. Kensington Gardens.

They courteously invited him ashore, and conversed with him by signs, but very little of the meaning of either party could be understood by the other.
Cook. Voyage, vol. ii. b. iii. c 8.

Sir T. More. Workes, p. 1235.

And as, syr, I knowe well that many men and women shoulde be therthrowe greatly troubled and sclaunderid, and as I said syr to you before, for myne untrewthe and false cowardness many a one sholde be put into full greate repreue.
State Trials. Wm. Thorpe, an. 14.

Yf he be so good a man, and so valyant in armes as it is sayde, he wyll nat refuse it for his ladyes sake: yf he do, it shall tourne hym to moche blame, for I shall repute wheresoeuer I go, that for cowardnesse he hath refused to ryn with me one course with a spere.
Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. i. c. 324.

Truly I think, ne vain is my beleefe,
Of Goddish race some ofspring should he be:
Cowardry notes hartes swarued out of kind.
Surrey. Virgile. Æneis, b. iv.

Therefore he that professed himselfe chiefe prelate of religion, being more wicked than all other, blameth the cowardship of them that with deliberate counsell, did further debate the matter, whether Jesus were to be put to death or nay
Udal. John, c. 11.

They went about with impudent words to smother his vertues, railing at him as a slow-backe and coward, and delicate carpet knight, and one that knew how with trim words to set out deedes that were amiss.
Holland. Ammianus, p. 93.

Why do I name the lordly creature man?
The weak, the mild, the coward woman can,
When to a crown she cuts her sacred way,
All that oppose with manlike courage slay.
Cowley. On the Government of Oliver Cromwell.

And seeing none behold us, there will be much less any one to take notice of our cowardize: the rather, because I heard oft-times the curate of our village, whom you know very well, preach, That he which seeks the danger, perisheth therein.—Skelton. Don Quixote, b. iii. c. 6.

Thou, that in counsels dost abound, O Laertiades,
Why stayst thou? why thus cowardlike, shunst thou the honour'd presse;
Take heed thy backe take not a dart.
Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. viii.

So those men that are prodigal of their lives in base quarrels, peradventure would be cowardly enough; if either public service, or religion did call for their help; I scarcely believe any of them would die martyrs, if the times so required it.—Hales. Rem. Ser. On Duels.

He saw that, by the drowning of the master, (whom he himself treacherously knocked on the head, as he was swimming for his life) by the flight and dispersion of others, and cowardly patience of the remaining company, all was abandoned to his pleasure.
Cowley. On the Government of Oliver Cromwell.

One of the souldiers when Harold was slaine did cut him in the legge with a sword, for the which deede Duke William, blaming him for his cowardlinesse and shameful act, put him out of the wars.—Stow. Harold, an. 1016.

But numbers of his coward foes.—Hudibras, pt. i. c. 3.

Now, pusillanimous, deprest with fear,
He checks his virtue in the mid career:
And of his strength distrusted, coward flies
The contest, though impow'rd to gain the prize.
West. Nemean Odes, Ode 11

Cowardice, considered as distinct from occasional panic, is that habitual temper and disposition, which disqualifies from opposing the dangers and difficulties, which it is our duty or interest to combat. Every indication of cowardice is an indication of culpable and unmanly fear.
Cogan. On the Passions, c. 2. s. 3

To which the loose improvidence, the cowardly rashness, of those who dare not look danger in the face, so as to provide against it in time, and therefore throw themselves headlong into the midst of it, have exposed this degraded nation, beat down and prostrate on the earth, unsheltered, unarmed, unresisting.

COZEN, v. } Minshew derives this verb from
CO'ZENAGE. } the noun cousin, (q.d.) to deceive
CO'ZENER. } any one per speciem affinitatis.
CO'ZENING. } Junius notices this etymology, but prefers the Dut. Koosen, lief koosen, blandiri, adulari, to fawn upon, soothe, or flatter. The primitive probably is the A. S. Costnian, to try, to tempt; costning, trial, temptation. "And ne geladde thu us on costnung;"—And lead us not into temptation.

To entice, to allure, delude, deceive, defraud, cheat, (to chouse, qv.)

Whereupon when he had played the cozening mate with others, (for oftentimes deceit and lying are joyned together, and he hath sufficiently proued himselfe to be a liar, by this triall of his wit,) peraduenture himselfe was beguiled by them whom he beforetime had defrauded.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 586.

And therefore let me beseech you to represent this condition to yourselves, and not any longer be flattered or cozened in a slow security; To day if you will hear his voice, harden not your hearts.—Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 559.

If you stir far in this I'le have you whipt, your ears nail'd for intelligencing o' the pillory, and your goods forfeit: you are a stale cozener, leave my house.
Beaum. & Fletch. The Scornful Lady, Act iii. sc. 1.

The number of concealers are indeed a number of cozeners which the law may easily correct.
Hobbs. Dialogue on the Common Law.

It is true, he delivered it [the staff] into his hand, desiring that he would hold it till he had sworn: but that artifice was a plain cozenage, and it was prettily discovered, for the injured person, in indignation at the perjury, smote the staff on the ground, and broke it, and espied the money

CRAB, n.
CRA'BBED, adj.
CRA'BBEDLY.
CRA'BBEDNESS.
CRA'BBY.

A. S. Crabba; Dut. Krabbe; Ger. Krabbe, krebs; Fr. Ecrevisse. Wachter thinks, from the Ger. Krupen; A. S. Creopan, reptare, to creep. Other etymologists, from the Gr. Καραβος; Lat. Carabus, cancri genus. Junius thinks, that from this unpleasant little animal (animalculo inamœno, horrente, minaci,) various things bitter, difficult, rough, grim or gloomy, are in English called crabbes or crabbed, e. g. a kind of bitter and unpleasant apple; a crabbed look, a grim or gloomy look. Skinner derives the apple, pomum sylvestre, from the Dut. Schrabben, schrappen, to scrape, to bite; from its biting, sharp and rough taste; and crabbed, (met.) either from the hardness of the wood, or harsh taste of the fruit. See the quotations from Holland. To crab, is—

To embitter or cause to be bitter; to be or cause to be difficult, harsh, sour, morose.

Ne drede hem not, doth hem no reverence,
For though thin husbond armed be in maille,
The arwes of thy crabbed eloquence

CRACK, or CRAKE, v.
CRA'CKER.
CRA'CKLE.
CRA'CKLING, n.
CRA'CKNEL.

Dut. Kracken; Ger. Krachen; Fr. Craquer; It. Crocchiare; Sp. Cruxir; all formed from the sound, (Skinner.) A source of etymology, Wachter observes, not to be resorted to without necessity: and in this instance perhaps it is so. The A. S. Hrac-od, with the prefix ge, would give ge-hracod, and by a common course of corruption, grac, or crac, crack—from the verb Wræc-an, affligere, to dash against. See RACK.

Crack is applied to the noise made, when any thing brittle partially bursts or breaks asunder; also, to the breach or separation itself; also, (met.) to bragging, i. e. breaking or bursting out, (sc.) in noisy threats or boastings, in clamorous pretensions. (See To BRAG.) And thus to crack, is—

To break or burst asunder partially; and, consequentially, (met.) to weaken, to injure, to destroy.

To send forth, utter or emit a sharp and sudden sound.

To brag or boast; in older authors written crake. Bale uses the expression brag boasting; and Chaucer, He cracked bost. See BRAG.

Crackle is a dim. and freq. of crack.

Cracknel, a kind of cake, which, when broken, edit crepitum, sends forth a crack.

For which the wardein chidde and made fare,
But thereof set the miller not a tare;
He cracked bost, and swore it n'as not so.
Chaucer. The Reves Tale, v. 3999.

CRAFT, v. }
CRAFT, n. }
CRA'FTILY. }
CRA'FTINESS. }
CRA'FTLESS. }
CRA'FTY. }
CRA'FTSMAN. }
CRA'FTSMASTER. } A. S. Craft; Ger. and Sw. Kraft; power, strength. Wachter thinks the word was originally Krat, from the Gr. Κρατος. Of this Ihre doubts. Junius observes that craft is frequently used by Chaucer for strength; transferred from bodily strength to mental; and thus applied, to—

Art, to science, to any trade, requiring art or dexterity; and (by the fault of those possessed of this mental power) applied to the power of deceiving, to artifice, to fraud. And see the quotation from Hobbs.

Craft will form regularly from the verb, To crave; Craved, crav'd, craft. To crave is, to beg, to require, to seek; and, hence, to inquire; and the past part. consequentially,—taught, learned, skilled.

Somner,—Craft, Ars, scientia, peritia, artificium, craft, art, science, skill, cunning; though now adayes it have almost lost the primitive signification, and for the most part is taken for fraud or deceit. Cræftig, crafty; cræft-lease, i. e. craftless; cræftlic, craftely. Craftes-man, in Chaucer, a skilful man.

"Trade or Craft" is a common legal and mercantile expression; and certain small vessels employed in trade are called Craft; i. e. crafters or traders; for by this latter name they are also signified.

"Cujus artifex et conditor est Deus," is rendered by Wiclif, "Whose crafti man and maker is God."

That craggedness or steepness of that mountain, maketh many parts of it in a manner inaccessible.
Brerewood. On Lang. p. 176.

Besides, they may often seeme broken, when they are not, because they are formed craggy by nature, or the wind, and the raine having long since beaten away the earth from them, may thus have left them to appeare the very true anatomies of themselves.
Verstegan. Restitution of Decayed Intelligence, c. 4.

The cragginess and steepiness of places up and down is a great advantage to the dwellers, and makes them inaccessible.—Howell. Instruction for Travellers, p. 132.

The island being generally mountainous, steep, and craggy, full of risings and fallings; 'tis very troublesome travelling up and down in it, unless in the cool of the mornings and evenings.—Dampier. Voyage, an. 1699.

We had, as at all other places, some difficulty in landing. The crags were irregularly broken, and a false step would have been very mischievous.
Johnson. Journey to the Western Islands.

At last through many a bog and lake,
Rough craggy road and thorny brake,
It led the easy fool, till night
Approach'd, then vanish'd in his sight.
Wilkie. The Boy and the Rainbow.

CRAM. "A. S. Cramman, farcire, infarcire, densare, constipare, to stuff or cramme," (Somner.) It is formed from the verb, Hremman, to ram, (qv.) Ge-hremm, grem or gram, cram. See CRAMP.

To stuff or stow, to pack or press, or squeeze close; to stuff or stow, (sc.) the stomach with excess of food; to compress, to constrict.

Yet they which cram them so with worldly pappe,
And neuer care to giue them heauenly crummes,
Shall see them starue, when happe of hunger comes.
Gascoigne. Glasse of Gouernment, Chor. to Act i.

But whā we be cõfaūiled to liue tẽperately, & forbere our delicates & our glotonye, yᵗ will we not here of: but fain wold we haue sõe medicines, as purgacions & vomites, to pul doun & auoid yᵗ we cram in too much.

Dryden. The Hind and the Panther.

Those endless readers may cram themselves in vain with intellectual food, and without real improvement of their minds, for want of digesting it by proper reflections.
Watts. Of Books and Reading, pt. i. c. 4.

CRAMBE. Mr. Gifford quotes, in explanation, "A play at short verses, in which the word is given, and the parties contend who can find most rhymes to it." Perhaps, cram, stuff, or stow in—the most rhymes. Strutt (Sports and Pastimes, iv. 4,) explains crambo similarly.

So that nobody hath reason to call it a crambe, who considers, that there are multitudes, even of scholars that have never seen or heard of any thing of this nature.
Glanvill. Pre-existence of Souls, b. iv. Pref.

Where every jovial tinker, for his chink,
May cry, mine host, to crambe! Give us drink.
B. Jonson. The New Inn, Act i. sc. 1.

His smiles in order set,
And every crambo he could get,
Had gone through all the common places,
Worn out by wits, who rhyme on faces.—Swift. To Stella.

Or (if he strives true patriots to disgrace,)

CRAMP, v. CRAMP, n. CRAMP, adj. } Ger. Krumpen, contrahi, h. e. per lineam curvam in se retrahi; Sw. Krympa, krumpna; Dut. Krimp, indigence, narrow or contracted circumstances; krimping, contraction; kramp, spasm, because it contracts, (Wachter.) It seems formed upon the verb To Cram, to press or compress, to constrict. And see CRIMP, and CRUMP.

To contract or draw together, to constrain, to confine, restrain or restrict; to hold or keep in confinement, bonds or fetters; to bind or fetter.

Cramp, the adj.—crabbed, difficult.

Hunt. ——— Pish! then I see
Thou dost not know the flexible condition
Of my apt nature; I can laugh, laugh heartily
When the gout cramps my joints
Ford. Perkin Warbeck, Act iii. sc. 2.

The cramp (no doubt) cometh of contraction of sinews; which is manifest in that it cometh either by cold, or dryesse; as after consumptions and long agues, for cold and dryesse do both of them) contract and corrugate. We see also, that chafing a little above the place in pain, easeth the cramp, which is wrought by the dilatation of the contracted sinews by heat.—Bacon. Naturall History, s. 964.

Say the crampe take either feet or legges, plucking and stretching the sinews when one is in bed, the next way to be used, is to set the feet upon the floore or the ground where the bed standeth or put case the crampe take the left side, then be sure with the right hand to catch hold of the great toe of the left foot; and contrariwise, if the crampe come to the right leg, do the like by the right foot.
Holland. Plinie, b xxviii. c 6.

I lived in the same house with a learned and judicious person, that was subject to be paralytic, who being frequently tortured by violent cramps was ordinarily and speedily relieved by wearing or handling the tooth of a true hippopotamus or river horse.—Boyle. Works, vol, v. p. 104.

CRANK, v. CRANK, n. CRANK, adj. CRA'NKLE. CRA'NKLING. } Dut. Kranck-en, krenck-en, debilitare, to debilitate or weaken, (Kilian.) Ger. Kranken, aegrotare, (Wachter.) Sw. Kraenca, deteriorem reddere, to deteriorate or cause to be worse. Howell (see the example from him) considers the Eng. Crank, though used in a directly opposite signification, to be the Dutch word. Skinner dislikes such antiphrases; and prefers un or onkranck, non ager, the initial syllable being lost through the ravages of time. Warton, (on Milton,) considers the word to be unexplained, and that we are to understand by it, cross-purposes. Minshew calls it an old word, and still in use among country people for "lustie, couragious, spiritful." He adopts the antiphrases rejected by Skinner.

Crank is, in Dutch, Kronckelen, to wring or wrench, to bend: and kronkelen is composed of the prefix ghe or ke, and wronkelen, to wring or wrench, to bend. The union of the prefix, g, k, or c hard, with the subsequent liquid, is of constant occurrence: ke-wronkelen, dropping the e and w in hasty pronunciation, becomes kronckelen. The consequential usages may be deduced with as little difficulty as those of buxom or boughsome, from the verb to bow, i. e. bend. See CRINKLE.

Crank, is—wrenched, twisted, bent. To crank,—to bend, to wind, to turn. A crank,—a bending, a winding course or way; any thing bent or turned; a course out of a straight line, crossing. In Milton (met.) a twist, a jerk; or, as Warton calls it, a "cross purpose." In Burton,—a wrong doer, a cheat. A ship is crank when she cannot keep a steady course; consequentially, crank is—

Pliant, agile, brisk, lively, jolly; and (as in Minshew) "lustie, courageous, spiritful." See BUXOM.

He, who was a litle before bedred and caried lyke a dead karkas on fower mannes shoulders, was now cranke and lustie.—Udal. Mark, c. 2.

But sodainly the Regent crappeled with her along boord, and when thei of the Carike perceiued that thei could not depart, thei let slip an anere, and so with the streme the shippes turned.—Hall. Hen. VIII. an. 4.

Soone as they did the monstrous scorpion view,
With ugly craples crawling in their way,
The dreadfull sight did them so sore affray,
That their wel knowen courses they forewent.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. v. c. 8.

CRA'PULA. Lat. Crapula; Gr. Κραιπαλη, παρα το καρα παλλειν, dolor caput vibrans—
A giddiness of the head.

The drunkard now supinely snores,
His load of ale sweats through his pores,
Yet, when he wakes, the swine shall find
A crapula remains behind.—Cotton. Night. Quatrains.

CRASH, v. } Lat. Dentibus stridere, per-
CRASH, n. } haps from the Dut. Schrantsen, to break with the teeth,
CRA'SHING, n. } to comminute, (to crush;) or
CRA'SHING, adj. } rather from the Fr. Escraser, to bruise, croissir, croquer, crepitare. Minshew, from the Ger. Rauschen, strepitum edere, to send forth a noise. All, Skinner adds, from the sound. It appears to be the same word as Crush, though usually applied to the sound caused by the act of crushing. See To CRUSH.

Weepe if thou canst a litle crashe,

More. Antidote against Atheism, b. iii. c. 6.

And must needs be therefore as a void solitude and empty space, a mere vacuum as to the search of any created sense, which roving up and down could finde no crassitude any where but what these perfect Parvitudes have.
Id. Appendix to Defence of the Cabbala, c. 9.

But when the passive affections of the soul are looked upon not as things really existing without the mind, but only as pictures of sensible things in the mind, or more crasse or corporeal cogitations, then they are called phantasms or imaginations.—Cudworth. Immutable Morality, b. iv. c. 1.

Scaliger finding a defect in the reason of Aristotle, introduceth one of no less deficiency himself; Ratio materiatis (saith he) sanguinis, crassitudo simul et multitudo; that is, the reason of the vigour of this side, is the crassitude and plenty of blood, but this is not sufficient; for the crassitude or thickness of blood affordeth no reason why one arm should be enabled before the other, and the plenty thereof, why both not enabled equally.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iv. c. 5.

For the ætherial body contracts crassness and impurity, by the same degrees as the immaterial faculties abate in their exercise.—Glanvill. Pre-existence of Souls, p. 150.

CRATCH. i. e. Scratch sculpere, insculpere. See Scratch, (Junius.)

So gret a weping was ther non certain,
Whan Hector was ybrought, all fresh yslain
To Troy, alas! the pitee that was there,
Cratching of chekes, rending eke of here.
Chaucer. The Knightes Tale, v. 2836.

CRATCH. Unless I am deceived, says Skinner, from the Lat. Cratica, cratucula, crates; a hurdle. See CRATE, infra.

Fr. Creiche, cresche; a rack, ox-stall, or crib, (Cotgrave.)

And sche baar her firste borun sone, and wlappide him in clothis, and leyde him in a cracche for ther was no place to him in no chaumbir.—Wiclif. Luke, c. 2.

Glory on high to heaven's king
Run shepherds, leave your nightly watch,
See heaven comes down to Bethleem's cratch.
Bp. Hall. Anthems. Christmas-day.

The shepherds and the cratch accorded well; yet even they saw nothing which they might not contemne; neither was there any of those shepherds that seemed not more like a king, then that king whom they came to see.
Id. Cont. The Sages and the Starre.

CRATE, n. Lat. Crates, ἀπο του κρατειν, quia lignum unum alterum tenet, (Vossius.)
Crate is now chiefly used for the open wicker or wooden case in which earthenware is packed.

I have seen a horse carrying home the harvest on a crate. Under his taile was a stick for a crupper, held at the two ends by twists of straw.
Johnson. Journey to the Western Islands.

CRAVA'T. Skinner writes it crabbat, or rather crabat, a word then recently introduced into this country: collare Croaticum, because the Croats first used this kind of collar or neck-cloth. Menage says, the Croats were commonly called cravates; and he names the year 1636 for the time of the introduction of this article of dress into France, about twenty-seven years before Butler published the three first cantos of his Hudibras. Ihre has no doubt the word is of Gothic origin, compounded of craw, the neck, and wad, cloth.

The handkerchief about his neck
Canonical crabat of Smeck,
From whom the institution came,
When church and state they set on flame,
And worn by them as badges then
Of spiritual warfaring men.—Hudibras, pt. I. c. 3.

Smectymnuus was a club of five parliamentary holders-forth; they wore handkerchiefs about their necks for a note of distinction, (as the officers of the parliament army then did,) which afterwards degenerated into carnal cravats.

That, as a boon, I should base shackles crave,
And, born to freedom, make myself a slave.
Churchill. The Conference.

CRA'VEN, adj. } Of the noun, Skinner says,
CRA'VEN, n. } I would rather derive it from
CRA'VEN, v. } the verb, to crave, quia statim, (sc.) ab hoste veniam petit. "Craven—is one who has craved or craven his life from his antagonist, dextramque precantem protendens," (Tooke, ii. 71.)
Upon this noun, Shakespeare has formed the verb, to craven,—to deprive of strength or courage.

For cowards such of craven kind like hinds are not to drink,
Nor wash in fair Eurotas stream
their bodies as I think.—Holland. Plutarch, p. 395.

Affirming in good earnest, it were better both for herselfe to be a widow, and for him to live single, and without a wife, than so to be mismatched as they were, and through the craven cowardise of others to languish and come to nothing.—Id. Livie, p. 33.

Ford. 'Tis Pity she's a Whore, Act I. sc. 2

——— Against self-slaughter
There is a prohibition so diuine
That cravens my weake hand.
Shakespeare. Cymbeline, Act. iii. sc. 4.

CRAUNCH. Dut. Schrantsen, frangere, rumpere, laniare, frendere, et mandere, dentibus frangere, (Kilian.)
Cranch, (in various parts pronounced schranch,) appears formed of the common prefix ce, (i. e. ke,) and ranch, to tear. See RANCH.
To crash, (qv.) crush, or bruise, with the teeth.

——— Yet sholde th' come another [eat]
To craunchen ous and al our kynde.—Piers Ploukman, p. 10

But Not very well; she cannot shoot at buts,
Or manage a great horse, but she can craunch
A sack of small coale! eat you lime and haire,
Soap-ashes, loame, and has a dainty spice
O' the greene sicknesse.
B. Jonson. The Magnetick Lady, Act I. s. 3.

She would craunch the wing of a lark, bones and all, between her teeth, although it were nine times as large as that of a full-grown turkey.—Swift. Voyage to Brobdignag.

CRAW, n. The crop or gorge of a bird; (from the Dut. Kraeghe, jugulus, the fore part of the neck, ingluvies, which Vossius calls the sinus interior circa guttur;) into which birds receive their food, before they pass it into their stomach. Ger. Kragen; Sw. Krage. See Minshew, and Ihre.

In birds, there is no mastication or comminution of the meat in the mouth; but in such as are not carnivorous, it is immediately swallow'd into the crop or craw, or at least into a kind of antestomach.—Ray. On the Creation, pt. I.

We have seen some [buzzards,] whose breast and belly are brown, and only marked across the craw with a large white crescent.—Pennant. British Zoology. The Common Buzzard.

CRAWL, v. }
CRA'WLER. }
CRA'WLING, adj. } Lat. Repere, to creep, serpere, to draw or draw along on the belly. Dut. Krielen, scatere, præsertim ut vermibus, (Skinner.)

To creep and to crawl, may admit the same distinction as the Lat. Repere, and Serpere do. The first being applied to express the motion of a short-legged animal; the second, the motion of animals upon their bellies, as the worm, the slug, the serpent.

—— An endles gulf down reatching deepe,
Shuld fowle apear, and crauling soules at light shuld
quaking creepe.—Phaer. Virgill. Æneidos, b. viii.

Beyng crailed in the deuilles snares.—Udal. Tim. c. 3.

He wonneth in the land of Fayeree,
Yet is no Fary borne, ne sib at all
To Elfes, but sprong of seed terrestriall,
And whylome by false faeries stolne away,
Whiles yet in infant cradle he did crall.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. iii. c. 3.

My comforts for heaven shall (I trust) never fail me; but for the present world, it shall be well for me, if I can without too much difficulty scramble out of the necessary miseries of this life, and without too much sorrow crawl to my grave.—Bp. Hall. Select Thoughts, § 24.

Unarm'd of wings and scaly oare,
Unhappy crawler on the land —Lovelace. Lucasta.

How hints, like spawn, scarce quick in embryo lie,
How new-born nonsense first is taught to cry,
Maggots, half-formed, in rhyme exactly meet,
And learn to crawl upon poetic feet.
Pope. The Dunciad, b. i.

Sometimes he'd scow'r along the streets like wind,
As if some fifty bailiffs were behind.
At other times he'd sadly saunt'ring crawl,
As though he led the hearse, or held the sable pall.
Smart. The Horatian Canons of Friendship.

CRARE. } says, "Sorte de vaisseau de guerre." And in his Latin Supplement, "Craiera,—Navis species, adde navis piratica, nostris etiam Craier."

See the quotation from Hackluyt.

Your barke or craer made here for the riuer of Volga and the Caspian sea is very litle, of the burthen of 30 tonnes at the most. It is handsomly made after the English fashion: but I thinke it too litle for your goods and prouision of victuals.—Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. I. p. 351.

Item, in the yeere of our Lord 1398, about the feast of S. Michael the Archangel, the foresaid Godekin & Stertebeker, with other their cõfederats of the Hans, took at Langsound in Norway a certain crayer of one Thomas Motte of Cley, called the Peter, (wherein Thomas Smith was master,) & the crayer they wickedly and unjustly carried away being worth 280 nobles.—Id. Ib. vol. I. p. 168.

—— Oh, melancholy!
Who ever yet could sound thy bottom? finde
The ooze, to shew what coast thy sluggish care (crare)
Might'st easiliest harbour in?—Shakes. Cymb. Act iv. sc. 2.

As often ye behold the tempests rough and proud
O'ertaken with a storm, some shell or little cray,
Hard labouring for the land, on the high working sea.
Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 22.

And this his maiestie's realm hath more plenty of ships, boats, crayes and other vessels, by reason of those, which by hope of lucre do follow that trade of living.
Strype. Originals, N. A Proclamation, Edw. VI. an. 1.

For skiffs, crays, shallops, and the like, why these
From ev'ry small creek cover'd all the seas
Drayton. Battle of Agincourt.

Nevertheless, Timoleon without, gave them all the aid he could possible: sending them corn from Catana, in the fisher boats and small crayers, which got into the castle many times.—North. Plutarch, p. 228.

CRAY-FISH, or } Minshew writes craie-fish
CRAW-FISH. } or craivish. Skinner, cray-fish potius crevice; both say, from the Fr. Escrevice; which Wachter derives from the Ger. Krebs. See CRAB.

Nor of the cray-fish here which creeps amongst my stones,
From all the rest alone, whose shell is all his bones.
Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 26.

The shell-fish are, muscles, cockles, scallops, cray fish, and many other sorts, all such as are to be found in every other part of the coast.—Cook. Voyage, vol. iii. b. I. c. 5.

CRA'YON, v. }
CRA'YON, n. } From Craye, chalk. Fr. Crayonner; to paint or draw in dry colours; also, to draw first lines, or make the first draught of a picture, (Cotgrave.)

Thy conscious pallet ne'er its hues should spare
To draw a sportsman's hound or racer's mare,
Nor thy reluctant crayon stoop to trace
A fool's dull eye or villain's ill mark'd face.
Scott. Essay on Painting.

And I wonder how any one can read the king's speech at the opening of that session, without seeing in that speech both the repeal and the declaratory act very sufficiently crayoned out.—Burke. On American Taxation.

He soon afterwards composed that discourse conformably to the plan which he had crayoned out, and sent it to me for such remarks on the language of it as should occur to me.—Malone. Life of Sir Joshua Reynolds, Note.

CRAZE, v. }
CRA'ZEDNESS. }
CRA'ZINESS. }
CRA'ZY. } Ihre, Lye, and Skinner, from the Fr. Ecraser, to crush, to break. See the first example from Chaucer. Minshew, from the Gr. Κρασις, temperamentum. (See CRASIS.) He who labours under any disease, is said to be crasie, propter δυσκρασιαν, or a bad temperature of body. (See DYSCRASY.) To craze, as generally applied, is—

To weaken, to debilitate, to impair, to deprive of natural strength, to bring to a state of imbecility.

I am right siker, that the pot was crased,
Be as be may, be ye no thing amased.
Chaucer. The Chanones Yemannes Tale, v. 16,402.

Upon her whan I gased
Me thought mine hart was crased.
Skelton. The Boke of Philip Sparow.

Downe mine eyes the stroke
descended to the harte,
Which Cupid neuer craside before
by force of golden darte.
Turbervile. The Lover declareth how first he was taken.

And on they come, as doth a rolling tide
Forc'd by a wind, that shoves it forth so fast,
Till it choke up some channel side to side.
And the craz'd banks doth down before it cast.
Drayton. Battle of Agincourt.

For no craz'd brain could ever yet propound,
Touching the soul, so vain and fond a thought;
But some among the masters have been found
Which in their schools the self-same thing have taught.
Davies. The Immortality of the Soul.

And Phœbus to invade it [the field] with his shield
Recovering Hector's brooside, and crased powres.
Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. xv.

—— Till length of years
And sedentary numness craze my limbs
To a contemptible old age obscure.
Milton. Samson Agonistes.

And the nature, as of men that have sick bodies, so likewise of the people in the crasedness of their minds poseet with dislike and discontentment at things present, is to imagine that any thing (the virtue whereof they have commended) would helpe them; but that most, which they least have tried.—Hooker. Ecclesiasticall Politie, Pref.

Or be the shepherds which doe serue her lassie?
That they list not their mery pipes apply,
Or be their pipes vntunable and crasie,
That they cannot her honour worthily?
Spenser. Colin Clout's come Home againe.

Yea though the cause we maintain be never so good, yet the issue of diseas'd and crazie proofs brought to maintain it, must neede be the same.—Hales. Rem. Ser. 2 Pet. iii. 16.

Whereas the Atheists, thus impute to the generality of mankind not only light-minded credulity, and phantastry, but also such an excess of fear as differs nothing at all from crazedness and distraction or madness.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, p 658.

There is no crasinesse we feel, that is not a record of God's having been offended by our nature; and every little ach about us is a thorn or briar springing out of that offensive earth, whereof we are composed.
Mountague. Devoute Essayes, pt II. Treat. 10. s. 2.

The sight of an old man, poor and destitute, crazy and scorned, unable to help himself, or to buy the help of others, is a shrewd argument to recommend covetousness to one even in his greenest years, and to make the very youngest and jolliest sparks, in their most flourishing age, look about them.—South, vol. iv. Ser. 10.

Pray let me ask of you, could not the great God who grasps and surveys all future and distant things in one single view, could not he from the beginning foresee your morning prayer for his protection, and appoint all second causes to concur for the support of that crazy bridge, or to make that old tower stand firm till you had escaped the danger.
Watts. On the Mind, pt. I. c. 10.

CREAK, v. }
CREAK, n. }
CRE'AKING, n. } Dut. Kricken; Fr. Criquer. All from the sound. Creak is applied to the noise emitted by ice when trodden upon, before the crack: to the noise of dry shoes, of a door opening, &c. It may be considered as the diminutive of Crack, (qv. and Croak.)

Kreke, as used by Fabyan, is now written croak.

He cryeth and he crekeih.—Skelton. Boke of Colin Clout.

A crowe that she hadde lykyngly fed and brought vp, kreked louder than he was accustomed to do.
Fabyan, vol. I. c. 213.

Forsooth because it goeth, as it were, reculing backward, it pierceth and boreth an hole into the ground, and never ceaseth all night long to creake very shrill.
Holland. Plinie, b. xxix. c. 6.

Here neither Chorus wafts you o'er the seas;
Nor creaking throne comes downe, the boyes to please.
B. Jonson. Every Man in his Humour, Prol.

Let not the creaking of shooes, nor the rustling of silkes, betray thy poore heart to woman.
Shakespeare. Lear, Act iii. sc. 4.

For like as when we heare the grunting of a swine, the creaking of a cart wheele, or pully, the whistling noise of the wind, or roaring of the sea, we take no pleasure therein, but are troubled and discontented.—Holland. Plutarch, p. 19.

At length some pity warm'd the master's breast
('Twas then his threshold first received a guest)
Slow creeking turns the door with jealous care,
And half he welcomes in the shivering pair.
Parnell. The Hermit.

Unlike to living sounds it came,
Unmix'd, unmelodis'd with breath:
But, grinding through some scrannel frame,
Creak'd from the bony lungs of death.
Langhorn. The Mistletoe and the Passion-Flower.

CREAM, v. }
CREAM, n. }
CRE'AMY. } Fr. Crème; It. Crema; A. S. Ream; Dut. Room; Ger. Ram. All, says Skinner, from the Lat. Cremor, supple, lactis. Cremor, Vossius derives from Cerno-ere, because it is that fatness, which is separated (secernitur) from the milk. Scaliger, (see in Menage, v. Creme,) thinks Cremor an old French word, signifying the juice expressed from any grain or seed.

In Devon, Lye says, Ream is still used. In A. S. we find Milc rem, in Ger. Milchraum. A. S. Hrim, is Pruina, the superficial hoar, or whiteness of frost, the Rime, (qv.) Cream is applied, (met.)—

To the richest portion of any thing.—To cream,

To rise to the surface, as cream does; to take or skim off the cream or richest portion.

Poure folke for fere tho. fedde Hunger gerne

There will no man deny but that baptisme was as full & as good as ours, & yet was there neither foute nor holy water, candle, creame, oyle, salt, godfather, or godmothers, or any other, popatrie.—Frith. Workes, p. 95.

There are a sort of men, whose visages
Do creame and mantle like a standing pond,
And do a wilfull stillnesse entertaine,
With purpose to be dreet in an opinion
Of wisedome, grauity, profound conceit.
Shakespeare. Merchant of Venice, Act I. sc. 1.

The poore old couple wish't their bread
Were wheat, their whig were perry,
Their bacon beefe, their milk and curd
Weare creame, to make him mery
Warner. Albions England, b. viii. c. 42.

In an instant, all the leads of the courts and entries were thronged with men and maid-servants of the duke's, who cried aloud, Welcome, Oh flower and cream of knights-errant —Shelton. Don Quixote, b. ii. c 31.

The. Your creamy words but cozen . how durst you
Intercept me so lately to my mother?
Beaum. & Fletch. Queen of Corinth, Act iii. sc. 1.

He observed the offer of alliance came to me in a letter of his majesty's own hand , but that about the terms of a peace, from the secretary only that it was in a style as if he thought him a child, or to be fed with whipped cream
Sir W. Temple. Memoirs, 1672-79.

In vain she tries her pastes and creams
To smooth her skin, or hide its seams,
Her country beaux and city cousins,
Lovers no more, flew off by dozens.
Goldsmith. The Double Transformation.

There each trim lass that skims the milky store
To the swart tribes, their creamy bowls allots,
By night they sip it round the cottage door
While airy minstrels warble jocund notes
Collins. Superstitions of the Highlands of Scotland.

CRE'ANCE, v. } Creance, n. Fr. Faith, be-
CRE'ANCE, n. } lief. Creance, v. to borrow, (Tyrwhitt.) "Fr. Creanser, to promise, to assure by his promise; to undertake upon his word," (Cotgrave.) It is—generally—
To deal upon credit.

A theef, that had reneyed our creance,
Came into the ship alone.
Chaucer. The Man of Lawes Tale, v. 5335.

We moun creancen while we han a name,
But goodles for to ben it is no game.
Id. The Shipmannes Tale, v. 13,219.

Through grace of God's puruiance
This maiden taught the creance
Unto this wife so perfectly —Gower. Con. A. b. ii.

The heyre is kept vnder with feare, and ruled as other men wyll, passyng that tyme vnder creansers & gouernours, untyl he be growen vp to that rypenes, whiche either the lawe or his father hath appointed.—Udal. Galatians, c. 4.

CREASE, v. } This word, so common in CREASE, n. } speech, is rare in writing. Robert of Gloucester writes Crusade or Croisade, Creyserie, and Crossed, Creysed; whence, says Mr. Hearne, I think came the common word, Crossed or Creased. Skinner thinks from the Lat. Creta, chalk, inasmuch as it is a line or mark drawn by chalk; or from the Ger. Kreiss, circulus. Mr. Hearne's etymology appears the more rational.

Mom. The creses here are excellent good: the proportion of the chin good; the little aptness of it to stick out good.
Sir Gyles Goosecappe, (1606,) Act ii. sc. 1.

Men of great parts are unfortunate in business, because they go out of the common road by the quickness of their imagination. This I once said to my Lord Bolingbroke, and desired he would observe, that the clerks in his office used a sort of ivory knife, with a blunt edge, to divide a sheet of paper, which never failed to cut it even, only requiring a strong hand; whereas if they should make use of a sharp penknife, the sharpness would make it go often out of the crease, and disfigure the paper.
Swift. Thoughts on Various Subjects.

This therefore was the first time, when we entred into the emperour's tent in his presence, after he was created emperour.—Hackluyt. Voyages. vol. i. p. 69.

As though he would sai, sith the bondman is no better then hys lorde, and I that am your creatour, am more highly lorde ouer you that are my creatures, than any earthly lorde is ouer his bondman, how should you disdayne to wash your felowes feete when I your highe lorde haue not disdained, to wash yours.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 1317.

As then Almighty God created all things of nothing by the power of his word. So doth hee still vphold them and will till the dissolution of all things in their essenses, faculties and operations, by the words of his power, reaching from one end to the other mightily, and disposing all things sweetely.—*Hakewill. Shakespeare. Midsummer's Night's Dream, Act v. sc. 2.

For Chaos heard his voice; him al his traine
Followed in bright procession to behold
Creation, and the wonders of his might.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. vii.

All and every title, every stroke, is no other than an inward living disposition of heart, like unto the divine life and nature of Christ, the son of the living God; and therefore requires the living power of the spirit of the living God, (as he is there styled,) to concur to the creating of it.
Goodwin. Works, vol. v. pt. i. p. 114.

But to begin that which never was, whereof there was no example, whereto there was no inclination, wherein there was no possibility of that which it should be, is proper onely to such power as thine; the infinite power of an infinite creator.—Bp. Hall. Cont. The Creation.

Yet still with gentle countenance retained,

More. On the Soul, pt. ii. b. i. s. 25.

This sisterly relation and consanguinity betwixt them, would of the two, rather degrade and creatureize that mundane soul, which is their third God or divine hypostasis, than advance and deifie those particular created souls.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, p. 594.

So was it a monstrous degradation of that third hypostasis of their Trinity, and little other than an absolute creaturizing of the same.—Id. Ib.

—— God was alone
And creatureless at first.
Donne. To the Countess of Bedford.

The state of elect and non-elect, afore or without the consideration of the fall, is that of creatureship simply and absolutely considered.—Goodwin. Works, vol. ii. pt. iv. p. 134.

But not only Timæus Locrus, but also Plato himself, calls it, θειον γεννητον, that is, a created God, the word γεννητον being here put for that, which after it once was not, is brought into being; which is the proper notion of a creature. So that the animated world is by Plato made to be only the chief of all the γεννητα θεοι, that is, the creature-gods.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, p. 551.

Whether this portion of the world were rent,
By the rude ocean, from the continent,
Or thus created; it was sure design'd
To be the sacred refuge of mankind.
Waller. To my Lord Protector.

By the poorest and most entire communication of being, God did not only produce, but create man. He gave him an existence out of nothing, and while he was yet but a mere idea or possibility in the mind of his eternal maker.
South, vol. iii. Ser. 1.

The bad treatment of those, who are suffered still to live in a society, is the creating of so many malcontents, who at some time or other may make those, who treat them ill, feel their revenge —Burnet. Own Time, Conclusion.

And thus has this poor impotent creature been perpetually hanging upon the bounty of his great creator, and by a daily preservation of his precarious being, stands obliged to him under the growing renewed title of a continual creation.
South, vol iii. Ser. 1.

The mind finds no great difficulty, to distinguish the several originals of things into two sorts: First, When the thing is wholly made new, so that no part thereof did ever exist before, as when a new particle of matter doth begin to exist, in rerum natura, which had before no being; and this we call creation.—Locke. Hum. Underst. b. ii. c. 26.

Notwithstanding there is such infinite room between man and his maker for the creature power to exert itself in, it is impossible that it should ever be filled up, since there will be still an infinite gap of distance between the highest created being, and the power which produced him.
Spectator, No 519.

Derham. Physico-Theology, b. iv. c. 13. Note m.

Another practice Gainsborough had, which is worth mentioning, as it is certainly worthy of imitation; I mean his manner of forming all the parts of his picture together: the whole going on at the same time, in the same manner, as nature creates her works.—Sir Joshua Reynolds, Dis. 14.

When man was first formed, creation was his book, and God his preceptor. The elements were so many letters, by means of which, when rightly understood and put together, the wisdom, power, and goodness of the great creator became legible to him.—Bp. Horne. Works, vol. iv. Dis. 30.

If a vagabond would do what him lust, and call himselfe your seruante, and execute such offices of trust, whether ye would or no, as ye haue committed to another man's credit, what would euery one of you say or doe herein? Would ye suffer it?—Sir John Cheke. The Hurt of Sedition.

By such like wiles of Sinon the forsworne
His tale with us did purchace credit: some
Trapt by deceite, some forced by his teres.

Surrey. Virgile. Æneis, b. ii.

Watte Tyler answered hym and sayd, Frende, appease yourse fe, thou shalte be well payed or this day be ended; kepe the nere me, I shall be thy credytour.

Berners Froissart. Cronycle, vol. i. c. 384.

The spirite of God with man's owne towardnesse and good endeavour, woorketh in man the credulitie and belief, by which we both beleeue the church in teaching vs which is the scripture, and also by which we beleeue the thyngis that are written in the scripture.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 579.

Saint Augustine was resolute in points of Christianitie to credite none, how godly and learned soeuer he were, vnlesse he confirmed his sentence by the scriptures, or by some reason not contrarie to them.

Hooker. Ecclesiasticall Politie, b. ii. § 4.

Mingle no matter of doubtful credit, with the simplicity of truth.—B. Jonson. Discoveries.

John. ——— O Sir, slow credit
Is the best child of knowledge.

Beaum. & Fletch. The Chances, Act v. sc. 1.

And there is an instance yet behinde, which is more creditable than either, and gives probability to them all.

Glanvill. Vanity of Dogmatizing, c. 21.

Leaving also the more common and ordinary measure and proportions of beneficence, wherein the better sort think they quit themselves like Christians, and come off fair and creditably; he chose the more excellent way, and he devoted unto God and set apart the tenth of his yearly incomes for charitable and pious uses.—Mede. Works. Life, p. 42.

Yet so great was this execrable deed,
As men would scarce therein believe their eyes
Much less their ears: and many sought to feed
The easy creditors of novelties,
By voicing him alive. Daniel. Civil Wars, b. iii.

But should we signify no more than only this to your highnesses, that she is a widow, that she is in great want, the mother of many small children, which her creditor endeavours to deprive of almost all that little support they have in this world, we cannot believe we need make use of any greater arguments to your lordships.

Milton. R. Cromwell. To the States of West Friezland.

For were thy selfe iuror and iudge of the most offensiue, my credulencie, or thine inconstancie, the iuror could not but giue verdict for Elisa and the iudge sentence against Æneas.—Warner. Albion's England, Addition to b. ii.

Devotion (mother of obedience)
Bears such a hand on their credulity,
That it abates the spirit of eminence,
And busies them with humble piety.

Daniel. Civil Wars, b. vi.

Had Argiue Hellen knowne credulitie
Would bring such plagues with it; and her againe
(As auctheresse of them all) with that foule staine
To her, and to her countrey; she had staid
Her lotie and mixture from a stranger's bed

Chapman. Homer. Odyssey, b. xxiii.

I will not foul my mouth to speak the sorceries
Of your seducer, his base birth, his whoredoms,
His strange impostures; nor deliver how
He taught a pigeon to feed in his ear,
Then made his credulous followers believe
It was an angel that instructed him
In the framing of his Alcoran.

Massinger. The Renegado, Act ii. sc. 3.

The city of York had too credulously believed King Edward's oath, not to disturb King Henry.

Baker. Edw. IV. an. 1471.

If the gospel and the apostles may be credited, no man can be a Christian without charity, and without that faith which works, not by force, but by love.

Locke. Letter concerning Toleration.

Though divers creditable witnesses deposed, that Gregory Bandan, who was common hangman, had confessed and owned to have executed the king, yet the jury found him [Captain William Howlet] guilty of the indictment.

Ludlow. Memoirs, vol. iii. p. 74.

Among all these snares, there is none more entangling than the creditableness and repute of customary vices.

Decay of Piety.

He who would act the destroyer, if he would do it effectually, should put on the reformer; and he who would be creditably, and successfully a villain, let him go whining, praying, and preaching to his work, let him knock his breast, and his hollow heart, and pretend to lie in the dust before God, before he can be able to lay others there.

South, vol. v. Ser. 5.

Many there are of the same wretched kind,
Whom their despairing creditors may find
Lurking in shambles; where with borrow'd coin,
They buy choice meats, and in cheap plenty dine.

Congreve. Juvenal, Sat. 11.

'Tis no less a truth than a paradox. That there are no greater fools than atheistical wits, and none so credulous as infidels.—Bentley, Ser. 2.

Beyond all credulity therefore is the credulousness of atheists, whose belief is so absurdly strong, as to believe that chance could make the world, when it cannot build a house: that chance should produce all plants, when it cannot paint one landskip, that chance should form all animals, when it cannot so much as make a lifeless watch.

Clarke, vol. i. Ser. 1.

Cicero in his letters to Atticus often mentions the difficulty of penetrating into Pompey's real designs; but if Cæsius may be credited, he was, it seems, one of those over refined dissemblers, who, as our British Horace observes, are
" ——— So very close they're hid from none." Pope.

Melmoth. Cicero, b. iii. Let. 2. N. 9

——— Th' unthrifty maid
Too credulously fond! who gave away
Her heart so lavishly, deserves to wed
The woes that from her indiscretion flow!

Then is he swiftest to begyle
The woman, whiche that like whyle
Set vpon hym feith of credence. Id. Ib. b. i.

Who promised alwayes to be our wall,
And badde vs trust as truely as our creedes,
That all good wordes should be perform'd with deedes.

Gascoigne. The Fruites of Warre.

But well I wote that the redde worm and the menow ben good bayten for him [the carp] at all tymes, as I have herd saye of persones credyble, and also founde wryten in bokes of credence.—The Boke of St. Albans, an. 1496.

So he dothe vndermynde
And such sleightes dothe fynde,
That the kynges mynde
By him is subuerted,
And so streitly courted
In credensing his tales,
That al is but nut shales.

Skelton. Why come ye not to Court?

Pursie, after the king's cordial recommendation, and deliverance of his letters credentials, the king's said secretary shal say, that the king's hignes, calling to his remembraunce, &c.—Strype. Records. Instruct. by the King, for Mr. Pace.

But when any man speaketh with aduisement and deliberation, the wordes are thē more credible; but yet if he sweare, it confirmeth the thing more.

Tyndall. Workes, p. 442.

And also I reporte me to all knyghtes and squyers of honour, bothe of Fraunce and of Englande, credably enfourmed of the hole mater

Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. ii. c. 161.

Doubtlesse, they worshipped Juppitter and Mercurie, that were the Goddes of the Greekes, and had the Greeke sacrifice, as it manifestly appeareth by the woordes of St. Luke and it may be credibly gathered, that Paule and Barnabas spake to them in Greeke

Jewell. Replie to M. Hardinge, p. 161

Nor exceeded be this love tale of
This lady and this knight.

Warner. Albion's England, b. xi. c. 76

With letters then of credence for

Id. Winter's Tale. Act i. sc. 2

And yet those very assemblies of bishops had no authority by their decrees to make a divine faith, or to constitute new objects of necessary credence.

Bp. Taylor. Liberty of Prophesying, s. 6.

Having now shewed their credential letters on both sides, the Spaniards excepted in those of the queen's against the epithete of most illustrious in the archduke's title.

Camden. Elizabeth, an. 1600.

The committee of estates excepted against the credentials of the English commissioners, because they were directed to the parliament of Scotland, which did not then sit, but only the committee of estates.

Whitelock. Memoirs. Charles I. an. 1647.

Whereunto we answere, that albeit the name of faith being properly and strictly taken, it must needs haue reference vnto some vttered word, as the object of belief: neuerthelesse with the ground of credit is credibilitie of things credited: and things are made credible, eyther by the knowne condition of the vtterer, or by the manifest likelihood of truth which they have in themselues; hereupon it riseth, that whatsoeuer wee are perswaded of, the same wee are generally said to beleeue.

Hooker. Ecclesiasticall Politie, b. ii. § 4.

But this creed-maker is cautious, beyond any of his predecessors: hee will not be so caught by his own argument; and therefore is very shy to give you the precise articles that every sincere Christian is necessarily and indispensably oblig'd to understand, and give his assent to.

Locke. Second Vindic. of the Reason. of Christianity.

The first is a faith of simple credence, or bare assent, acknowledging and assenting to the historical truth of every thing delivered in God's word.—South, vol. viii. Ser. 2.

He some time since had left his frock for a petticoat, and insinuated himself so far in the Swedish court as to procure a commission (or credence at least) for a certain petty agency in England.—Sir W. Temple. Memoirs, an. 1672 9.

And for this great dominion here,
Which over other beasts we claim,
Reason our best credential does appear,
By which indeed we dominier,
But how absurdly we may see with shame.

Buckinghamshire. Ode on Brutus.

One Mr. Benjamin Barker, a man that I have been long well acquainted with, and know him to be a very diligent and observing person, and likewise very sober and credible, told this Mr. Hill.—Dampier. Voyage, an. 1683.

No article of religion, though as demonstrable as the nature of the thing can admit hath credibility enough for them.

Bentley, Ser. 2.

The present question, concerning the reality of the miraculous powers of the primitive church, depends on the joint credibility of the facts, pretended to have been produced by those powers, and of the witnesses, who attest them.—The credibility of facts lies open to the trial of our reason and senses, but the credibility of witnesses depends on a variety of principles, wholly concealed from us, and tho', in many cases, it may reasonably be presumed, yet in none, can it certainly be known.

Middleton. On the Miraculous Powers, Pref. 9

The credibleness of a good part of these narratives has been confirmed to me by a practiser of physic in the East Indies.—Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 435.

However, the preliminary ground of credence was the same, in both; namely, that the doctrines they taught were worthy of God. This worth consists in their truth, and in their importance.—Warburton, vol. ix. Ser. 5.

He goes out the declared emissary of a faithless ministry. He has perfidy for his credentials.

Burke. On a Regicide Peace, Let. i.

They lay five or six large eggs, of a dirty whitish hue, sprinkled all over with minute deep rust color spots; and we have been credibly informed that they will sometimes lay fourteen and more.

Pennant. British Zoology. The Common Coot.

CREEK, v. CREEK, n. CRE'EKY. } Minshew thinks from the verb, to creak, from the noise made by the waters in so confined a spot.

Skinner prefers the Ger. Kriechen, repere, serpere, to creep, to crawl; quia, (sc.) mare seu fluvius inter littus proserpit, eique se ingerit. Minshew calls it—

A nook or corner in a haven or river.

It is probably the same word as Crook, (qv.)

He knew wel alle the havens, as they were,
Fro Gotland, to the Cape de Finestere,
And every creke in Bretagne and in Spaine:
His barge ycleped was the Magdelaine
Chaucer. The Prologue, v. 411.

But when they could not get into the creeke, as they had purposed, but by violence of the wyndes wer driuē into a place yt hong a great way into the sea, there they pytched in the ship.—Udal. Acts, c. 27.

As streams, which with their winding banks do play,
Stopp'd by their creeks, run softly through the plain,
So in th' ear's labyrinth the voice doth stray,
And doth with easy motion touch the brain.
Davies. Immortality of the Soul.

Willibourne (by the old name the author calls her Willy) derived from near Selwood by Warminster, with her creeky passage crossing to Wilton naming both that town and the shire.—Selden. Illust. of Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 3.

They are the subsidings of valleys or low lands, that make dents in the shore and creeks, small bays, and harbours, or little coves, &c which afford good anchoring, the surface of the earth being there lodged deep under water.
Dampier. Voyage, an. 1687.

When the master returned, he reported that there was no passage into the lake by the creek which was fifty fathoms wide at the entrance, and thirty deep; farther in, thirty wide and twelve deep; that the bottom was every where rocky, and the sides bounded by a wall of coral rocks.
Cook. Voyage, vol. iii. b. ii. c. 11.

CREEP, v. CRE'EPER. CRE'EPINGLY. } A.S. Creopan; Dut. Kruypen, repere; applied to the slow motion of a short-legged animal, as the lizard. See To CRAWL, from which, (met.) it is scarcely distinguishable.

To move with a slow and low pace, sluggishly, lazily, lurkingly.

So thycke hii come, that the lond ouer al hii gonne fulle,
As thycke as ameten [i. e. emmets] crepeth in an amete hulle.—R. Gloucester, p. 296.

Into which I lookyng biheelde and sighe foure footid beestis of the erthe and beestis and crepinge beestis and volatilis of heuene.—Wiclif. Dedis, c. 11.

To-morowe at night, whan men ben all aslepe,
Into our kneding tubbes wol we crepe
And sitten ther, abiding Goddes grace.
Chaucer. The Milleres Tale, v. 3594.

Amonge thy plaining wordes, me thought thou allegeste thinges to be letting of thine helping, and thy grace to hinder, wherthrough me thinketh that wanhope is crepe through thine herte.—Id. The Testament of Loue, b. i.

Yee that in waters glide, and yee that walk
The earth, and stately tread, or lowly creep;
Witness if I be silent, morn or even,
To hill, or valley, fountain, or fresh shade
Made vocal by my song, and taught his praise.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. v.

For many a time the fishers twitch up their hookes, and see a number of these skippers and creepers settled thicke about their baits which they laid for fishes.
Holland. Plinie, b. ix. c. 47.

The soul of a righteous man is vexed and afflicted with the inroads of his unavoidable calamities, the armies of Egypt, the lice and flies, his insinuating creeping infirmities.
Bp. Taylor. On Repentance, c. 3. s. 3.

Sad Cupid now despairs of conquering hearts,
Throws by his empty quiver, breaks his darts;
Eases his useless bows from idle strings
Not flies, but humbly creeps with flagging wings.
Sidney. Elegy upon the Death of Tibullus.

We see, that as fish do live in the waters, (salt and fresh) so do many animals live in the earth, or under ground; not only worms and serpents, toads, frogs, and efts, but an innumerable host of creepers.—Boyle. Works, vol. vi. p. 382.

How slily and creepingly did he address himself to our first parents! which surely his pride would never have let him do, could he have effected their downfall by force, without temptation.—South, vol. viii. Ser. 4.

The entrance is made indifferently in the end or side, and is an oblong hole, so low, that one must rather creep than walk in.—Cook. Voyage, vol. vi. b. iii. c. 12.

CREMA'TION. Lat. Cremare, atum, to burn.

And the Chinois without cremation or urnal interment of their bodies, make use of trees and much burning, while they plant a pine-tree by their grave.
Brown. Urn Burial, c. 1.

CREPU'SCULINE. CREPU'SCULOUS. } Fr. Crepuscle; Lat. Crepusculum; of uncertain origin.

The twilight.

He has made apertures to take in more or less light as the observer pleases, by opening and shutting like the eye, the better to fit glasses to crepusculine observations.
Sprat. History of the Royal Society, p. 314.

And if we consider the magnalities of generation in some things, we shall not controvert its possibilities in others: not easily question that great work whose wonders are only second unto those of the creation, and a close apprehension of the one might perhaps afford a glimmering light, and crepusculous glance of the other.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. vii. c. 2.

The beginnings of philosophy were in a crepusculous obscurity; and its yet scarse past the dawn.
Glanvill. Vanity of Dogmatizing, c. 19.

CRE'SCENT, adj. CRE'SCENT, n. CRE'SCENT, v. CRE'SCENCE. CRE'SCIVE. } Fr. Croistre, croissant; It. Crescere, crescente; Sp. Crecer, creciente; Lat. Crescens, pres. part. of crescere, to grow, (perhaps creas-ere, from cre-are.)

Growing, enlarging. The noun is applied to the moon in her state of growth, till she shows one half of her enlightened side; to any thing formed or shaped like the moon in that state of growth.

The Christian crew came on in forme of battayle pight,
And like a crescent cast themselues preparing for to fight.
Gascoigne. Flowers.

This cressant was couered with frettes and knottes made of iue bushes and boxe braunches, and other thynges that longest would be green for pleasure.—Hall. Hen. VIII. an. 12.

As lusty youths of crescive age doe flourishe freshe and grow.
Drant. Horace. The Arte of Poesy.

——— With these in troop,
Came Astoreth, whom the Phœnicians call'd
Astarte, Queen of Heav'n, with crescent horns.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. i.

With these of Dartmouth, seven good ships there were,
The golden crescent in their tops that bear.
Drayton. The Battle of Agincourt.

And so the prince obscur'd his contemplation
Vnder the veyle of wildenesse, which (no doubt)
Grew like the summer grasse, fastest by night,
Vnseene yet crescive in his facultie.
Shakespeare. Hen. V. Act i. sc. 1.

And I doubt we shall never leave off the rank humour of adding even to the oracles of God, till the crescent sword makes us more humble, and more reasonable.
Boyle. Works, vol. vi. p. 340.

For me imagination's power
Leads off insensibly my way,
To where, at midnight's silent hour,
The crescent moon's slow-westering ray
Pours full on Redcliff's lofty tow'r,
And gilds with yellow light its walls of grey
Scott, Ode 21.

The winds were pillow'd on the waves;
The banners droop'd along their staves,
And, as they fell around them furling,
Above them shone the crescent curling.
Lord Byron. The Siege of Corinth.

To these adverse, the lunar sects dissent,
With convolution of opposed bent:
From west to east by equal influence tend,
And towards the moon's attractive crescence bend.
Brookes. Universal Beauty, b. iii.

CRE'SSES. A.S. Carse, or cerse; Dut. Kerse; Ger. Kresse; Sw. Krassa; It. Crescione; Fr. Cresson. So called, says Menage, a crescendo. Anciently written, Kerse, (qv.)

As for cresses, they coole and dull the heat of the flesh, howsoever otherwise they give an edge to wit and understanding.—Holland. Plinie, b. xx. c. 13.

He can suffer his day's labour, and recompence it with unsavory herbs, and potent garlick, with water cresses, and bread colour'd like the ashes that gave it hardness.
Bp. Taylor, vol. i. Ser. 15.

CRESSET, n. Minshew calls it an old word used for a lanterne, or burning beacon; from the Dut. Kerse, candela. Skinner prefers the Fr. Croisart, a little cross, because the sign of the cross was usually placed upon beacons.

The litell people, whiche he brought
Was none of hem that he ne hath
A potte of arthe whiche he tath
A light brennying in a cresset.—Gower. Con. A. b. vii.

The continuall light of lampes before the high aulters, the burninge cressettes at triumphes in the night.
Bale. Image, pt. ii.

Than the knight retourned to therle as fast as he might, who was comyng out of his lodgynge a horseback with a great nobre of cressettes and lightes with hym, and was going to the market place.—Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. i. c 400.

That [sc. the music of the nightingale] (with the repercussion of the air)
Shook the great eagle sitting in his chair,
Which from the mountain (with a radiant eye)
Brav'd the bright cressit of the glorious sky.
Drayton. The Man in the Moon.

——— From the arched roof
Pendant by subtle magic many a row
Of starry lamps and blazing cressets, fed
With naphtha and asphaltus, yielded light
As from a sky.—Milton. Paradise Lost, b. i.

CREST, v. CREST, n. CRE'STED, adj. CRE'STLESS. } Fr. Creste; It. and Sp. Cresta; Lat. Crista; of uncertain etymology. "Fr. Creste; a crest, cop, comb; also a tuft or little plume, standing at the top of," (Cotgrave.) And see the example from Camden.

To crest,—to wear a crest; to adorn with a crest; to serve for, stand in the place or stead of, a crest.

Crest-fallen,—(met.) dejected, humbled, dispirited.

And on his heed there stont vp right
A crest in token of a knight.—Gower. Con. A. b. v.

——— Turnus bright,
Displaies himself in armes, aboue all men with head vpright,
Whose triple crowned creast, and helmet his, with vgly pawes
Chimera monster holdes, and sparkling flames she spoutes at fawes.—Phaer. Virgill. Æneidos, b. vii.

——— Ech one his hundred souldiers led
Carnation creastid youth in burnisht gold gay glittering red.—Id. Ib. b. ix.

Like as the shining sky in summer's night,
What time the dayes with scorching heat abound,
Is creasted all with lines of firie light,
That it prodigious seems in common people's sight.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. iv. c. 1

Cleo. His legges bestrid the ocean, his rear'd arme

Shakespeare. Anthony & Cleopatra, Act v. sc. 2.

Creasts being the ornaments set on the eminent toppe of the healme, and called tymbres by the French, I know not why, were vsed auntiently to terrifie the enemy, and therefore were strange deuises or figures of terrible shapes.
Camden. Remaines. Armories.

The first Christians vsed no other blason in their shields then the name of Christ, & a crosse for their creast,—Wherevpon many yeares were these creasts arbitrarie, taken vp at euery man's pleasure, after they beganne to be hereditarie, and appropriated to families.—Id. Ib.

Much he [Papirius] spake also as touching the present preparation and magnificent furniture of the enemies, more brave & goodly for shew and ostentation, than effectual and of importance in the end: For they are not the plumed creats (quoth he) that give the deadly wounds, but the Romanes speare and launce it is, that is able to pierce their guilded and damasked shields.—Holland. Livie, p. 381.

His grandfather was Lyonel Duke of Clarence,
Third sonne of the third Edward King of England:
Spring crestless yeomen from so deep a root?
Shakespeare. 1 Part Hen. VI. Act ii. sc. 4.

Thus when the crest-fain Israelites were to be redeemed from an Ægypt to a Canaan they cry out upon Moses and Aaron, Exod. 5, chide with their Saviours, abomine with their deliverers.—Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 515.

And on both sides marched a double ranke of armed men, with targuets and crested helmets, sending rales and beames from them of brandishing light, wearing upon them fine habergeons.—Holland. Ammianus, p. 63.

The time shall come when Chanticleer shall wish
His words unsaid, and hate his boasted bliss:
The crested bird shall by experience know,
Jove made not him his master-piece below;
And learn the latter end of joy is woe.
Dryden. Cock & Fox.

But if the poem suffers from delay,
Let the lines fly precipitate away,
And when the viper issues from the brake,
Be quick; with stones, and brands, and fire attack
His rising crest, and drive the serpent back.
Pitt. Vida. Art of Poetry.

—— No foe to man
Lurks in the serpent now: the mother sees,
And smiles to see, her infant's playful hand
Stretch'd forth to dally with the crested worm,
To stroke his azure neck, or to receive
The lambent homage of his arrowy tongue.
Cowper. Task, b. vi.

CRETA'CEOUS. Lat. Creta, chalk. Chalky.

Nor from the sable ground expect success,
Nor from cretaceous, stubborn, and jejune.
J. Philips. Cider, b. i.

CRE'VICE, v. } Skinner says, Crevasse, or CRE'VICE, n. } crevis, from the Fr. Crevasse, rima, a chink, from the Lat. Crepare, i. e. dissilire, dehiscere, to leap asunder, to yawn or gape. It. Crepatura. The French have the verb—

"Crevasser,—to chop, chawn, chap, chink, rive or cleave asunder," (Cotgrave.)

Or but it might out there passe
It gan out crepe at some crevasse
And flew forth fast for the nones.
Chaucer. The House of Fame, b. iii.

Because so laid, they are more apt in swagging down, to pierce with their points, than in the jacent posture, and so to crevice the wall.—Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 20.

As the pulse declareth how the heart doth worke, so the verye thoughts and cogitations of man's mind, be they good or bad, doe no where sooner bewray themselues, then through the crevasses of that wall, wherewith nature hath compassed the cels and closets of fancy.—Hooker. Eccl. Pol. b. v. §65.

I thought it no breach of good manners to peep at a crevice and look in at people so well employed; but who should I see there but the most artful procuress in the town, examining a most beautiful country-girl, who had come up in the same waggon with my things.—Spectator, No. 266.

Trickling through the crevic'd rock,
Where the limpid stream distils,
Sweet refreshment waits the flock
When 'tis sun-drove from the hills.
Cunningham. Day. A Pastoral.

Eyeless a huge and starv'd toad sat
In corner murk aloof,
And many a snake and famish'd bat
Clung to the crevic'd roof.—Mickle, Ballad 3.

Enchanting novelty, that moon at full,
That finds out ev'ry crevice of the head,
That is not sound and perfect, hath in theirs
Wrought this disturbance.—Cowper. Task, b. vi.

CREW, n. Written by some of our old writers Crue, and said by Minshew, (in his first edition,) to be the Fr. Accrue, (or crue,) i. e. a growth, rising or augmentation. (See ACCREW.) Skinner prefers the Dut. Kroegh-en, cauponari, potare, inebriare; to carouse, to drink; and thus to denote,—an assembly or company of drinking, or jovial fellows. In A. S. Cread, cruth, is a crew, or crowd. (See CROWN.) The word is applied to—

A collected, mixed, number or assembly of persons; a crew of noble knights; a ship's crew.

Aske Julius Cæsar if this tale be true.
The man that conquer'd all the world so wide,
Whose onely worde commaunded all the crue
Of Romayne knights at many a time and tide,
Whose pompe was thought so great it could not glide.
Gascoigne. The Fruites of Warre.

If she be one of Creslid's crue
and swerue her former heet,
No Lucrece must I tearme hir then,
for that were but a iest.
Turbervile. His Loue fitted from wonted Troth.

The King's owne troupe came next, a chosen crew,
Of all the campe the strength, the crowne, the flowre,
Wherein each soldiour had with honours dew
Rewarded beene, for seruice ere that howre.
Fairefax. Godfrey of Boulogne, b. xvii. s. 29.

Being sufficiently weary of this mad crew, we were willing to give them the slip at any place from whence we might hope to get a passage to an English factory.
Dampier. Voyage, an. 1687.

What passions reign among thy crew, Leontius?
Does cheerless diffidence oppress their hearts?
Or sprightly hope exalt their kindling spirits?
Do they with pain repress the struggling shout,
And listen eager to the rising wind.
Johnson. Irene, Act. ii. sc. 4.

CRE'WEL, n. } Crewell or cruel. Skinner
CRE'WEL, adj. } thinks from the Ger. Klawel, klewel; Dut. Kloven, glomerare filum. (See CLEW.) And klawel, he believes to be a contraction, or corruption of the Lat. Globulus; Wachter adds, or the Gr. Κυκλειν, volvere, to roll. It is the name of—

A kind of fine worsted.

As a piece of arras is composed of severall parcels, some wroght of silke, some of gold, silver, crewell of divers colours, all to serve for the exornation of the whole.
Burton. Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 332.

And may Don Provost ride a feasting long
In his old velvet jirkin, and stain'd scarfes,
(My noble soveraigne, and worthy generall)
Ere we contribute a new crewell garter
To his most worsted worship.
B. Jonson. The Alchemist, Act i. sc. 1.

—— The rest whom fate had plac'd
In honest mediocrity, content
With base materials, sat on well tann'd hides,
Obdurate and unyielding, glassy smooth,
With here and there a tuft of crimson yarn,
Or scarlet cruel in the cushion fix'd —Cowper. Task. b. i.

CRIB, n. A. S. Cribbe; Dut. Krippe, krebbe; Ger. Krippe, kruppe. Somner explains A. S. Cribbe, a couch or bed, a stall or stable; a manger or cribbe. Junius says, he has never found the word in A. S. records, and thinks it was taken, in honorem beati salvatoris, from κραβατος, lectus, a bed. Wachter considers the primitive to be Krippe, pecten, a comb; deriving its application from the form of the bars or lattice-work, within which the fodder was placed.

To cribb,—to put, place, enclose, confine, as in a cribb or any small place.

To cribb, is a common word for—to take, to steal, to purloin; and is probably formed from the verb to rive, or reave, with the prefix ce, (i. e. ke.) See BRIBE.

Where no oxen are, there the cribbe is emptye: but where the oxen labboure there is muche frute.
Bible, 1551. Proverbs, c. 14.

Let a beast be lord of beasts, and his crib shall stand at the king's mosse —Shakespeare. Hamlet, Act v. sc. 2.

Neuer to seeke after God, sauing onely when either the crib or the whip doth constraine, were brutish seruilitie
Hooker. Ecclesiasticall Politie, b. v. p. 248.

But go to the crib thou glutton, and there it will be found that when the charger is cleane, yet nature's rules were not prevaricated: the beast eats up all his provisions because they are natural and simple or if he leaves any, it is because he desires no more than till his needs be served.
Bp. Taylor, vol. i. Ser. 16.

Will the tall steer, which knows no lord but me,
Low at the crib, and ask an alms of thee?
Young. On Part of the Book of Job.

CRICK. } Crick or creek in the neck, Junius
CRI'CKET. } thinks, is from the A. S. Cricce, (Eng. Crutch.) a staffe; because the neck of one so afflicted is as stiff and immovable as a staff. Skinner, that it may be—to creak or crack, because the neck feels as if it would crack or burst asunder. In Sir John Davies, it seems to be no other than creek, (qv.) a nook or corner.

Cricket, the insect,—certainly from the noise or sound it utters.

Cricket, the game,—from A. S. Cricce, a staff, (cricce, ce-ricce;) with which the balls were struck. See RACKET.

The cryket by kynde of fur, [i. e. fire]
Piers Ploughman, p. 255.

Forsooth because it goeth as it were reculing backward, it pierceth and boreth an hole into the ground, and never ceaseth all night long to creake very shrill. They take a flie and tie it about the middest at the end of a long haire of one's head, and so put the said flie into the mouth of the cricket's hole; but first they blow the dust away with their mouth, for feare lest the flie should hide herselfe therein. the cricket spies the silie flie, seaseth upon her presently, and claspeth her round, and so they are both drawne foorth together by the said haire —Holland. Plinie, b. xxix. c. 6.

Of all their ways, I love Meander's path,
Which to the tune of dying swans doth dance,
Such winding slights, such turns and cricks he hath,
Such creaks, such wrenches, and such dalliance.
Davies. On Dancing.

With water he giveth it for the dropsie; to those also that with a cricke or crampe have their necks drawne backward.
Holland. Plinie, b. xx. c. 5.

A screech owl at midnight has alarmed a family more than a band of robbers; nay the voice of a cricket hath struck more terrour than the roaring of a lion.—Spectator, No. 7.

—— Far remote
From Mirth's mad shouts, that thro' th' illumin'd roof
Resound with festive echo, let me sit
Blest with the lowly cricket's drowsy dirge.
Warton. Pleasures of Melancholy.

As much as I delight in the honest country folks, they do now and then throw a pot of ale at my head, and sometimes an unlucky boy will drive his cricket-ball full in my face.
Rambler, No. 30.

England, when once of peace and wealth possess'd,
Began to think frugality a jest,
So grew polite, hence all her well bred heirs
Gamesters and jockies turn'd, and cricket players.
Jenyns. Horatii. Epist. i. Lib. 2. imitated.

CRIME, n. } Fr. Crime; It. Crimine, Sp. Crimen; Lat. Crimen. Quia, (says Vossius,) qui judicat, is litem separat, ac verum, a falso distinguit, hinc factum est, ut κρινω, (i. e. dirimo, sejungo, separo,) secundario ponatur pro judicare, a quâ significatione est Græcum κριμα, pro judicio, et Latinum crimen pro delicto, quia ob crimen, aliquis judicatur ac damnatur. (See DISCRIMINATE.) For the common legal application, see the examples from Blackstone.

CRIMINA'LITY.
CRI'MINALLY.
CRI'MINALNESS.
CRI'MINATE, v.
CRIMINA'TION.
CRI'MINOUS.
CRI'MINOUSLY.
CRI'MINOUSNESS.

An act contrary to some law, human or divine; a failure in the performance of that which is ordered; an opposition or resistance to an offence against that which is ordered; a doing of that which is ordered not to be done: (sc.) ordered by human or divine authority.

Crime is also applied both to the cause, the source or origin, the temptation to the criminal act; and to the effect; the guilt, the infamy, the reproach.

Therfore he seide, thei that in ghou ben myghti come down togidre, and if ony cryme is in the man accuse thei hym.—Wiclif. Dedis, c. 25.

I shal him tellen which a gret honour
It is to be a flatering limitour,
And eke of many another maner crime,
Which nedeth not rehersen at this time.
Chaucer. The Frere's Prologue, v. 6877.

Also thirdly it is agreed that whosoeuer of Prussia is determined criminally to propound his criminal complaints in England namely that his brother or kinsman hath beene slaine, wounded, or maimed by Englishmen, the same partie is to repayre vnto the citie of London in England.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. i. p. 151.

Consider also, good readers, that by the lawes afore made, there was not only foreboden to beare witnes, he that appeared to be once forsworn, but also many other maner of crymynous persons, for the general presumpcion that they wer vnwoorthy credence.—Sir T. More. Workes. p. 1003.

Item, that an order may be taken for the bringing up of youth in good learning and vertue; and that the schoolmasters of this realm may be Catholick men, and all other to be removed that are sacramentaries, or hereticks, or otherwise notable crimynous persons.—Burnet. Rec. b. ii. pt. ii. No. 16. Lower House of Convocation to the Upper.

Great God it planted in that blessed sted
With his almighty hand, and did it call
The tree of life, the crime of our first father's fall.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. i. c. 2.

—— But tell me,
Why you proceeded not against these feates,
So crimefull, and so capitall in nature.
Shakespeare. Hamlet, Act iv. sc. 7.

And had I twentie times so many foes,
And each of them had twentie times their power,
All these could not procure me any scathe
So long as I am loyall, true, and crimeless.
Id. 1 Part Hen. VI. Act ii. sc. 4.

The ends [of drink] are digestion of our meat, cheerfulness and refreshment of our spirits, or any end of health; besides which if we go at any time beyond it, it is inordinate, and criminal, it is the vice of drunkenness.
Bp. Taylor. Holy Living, c. i. s. 2.

The highest danger is not in every sin; offences and crimes must be distinguished carefully: for the same severe impositions are not indifferently to be laid upon criminals, and those whose guilt is in such instances from which no man is free.—Id. On Repentance, c. 3. s. 5.

Providing always, that this be not prejuditiall to the ordinary jurisdiction of judges; but that men may pursue their actions by order of law, civilly or criminally, as it pleaseth them.—Knox. History of Reformation, an. 1560.

It being no undertaking of ours to confess first, and then excuse our schism, or avert the criminalness of it.
Hammond. Works, vol. ii. p. 131.

As there is nothing that raises so deadly hostilitie as religion, so no criminations are so rife, or so havnous, as those which are mutually cast upon the abettors of contrary opinions.—Bp. Hall. Christian Moderation, b. ii. s. 10.

He perceived him to be more estranged than before time through the slaunders and criminous imputations which M. Lollius, companion and governour to the saide Caius, had put into his head.—Holland. Suetonius, p. 94.

For it seemed by their distemperature that it sounded very criminously on their trial, and therefore utterly denying all that was alledged, they protested themselves true and faithful subjects.
State Trials. E. Campion and others, an. 1581.

And to this I that did not really adhear to that, will not be so far concerned in it, as to make any reply, or at all to endeavour to defend it, or to add of it further than this, that the bare possibility that it might so signifie, supersedes all demonstrativeness of proof from this text, for the criminousness of will worship.—Hammond. Works, vol. ii. p. 178.

There are numberless little crimes which children take no notice of while they are doing, which, upon reflection when they shall themselves become fathers, they will look upon with the utmost sorrow and contrition, that they did not regard, before those whom they offended were to be no more seen.—Spectator, No. 203.

Suppose a civil magistrate should have a criminal brought before him, accused, for instance, of murder, burglary, or the like, and the fact is proved, would you not have him in that case to pronounce the sentence that the law has awarded to all such malefactors.—Sharp, vol. vi. ser. 6.

Being accused in the House of Commons, though they thought not convenient to proceed against him criminally; yet upon this, and divers other considerations, they removed him.—Ludlow. Memoirs, vol. iii. p. 110.

There is a great deal of difference as to the criminalness of false persuasions upon this account; the same error which one person may hold very pardonably, may be extremely dangerous in other persons that have better parts, and have had a better education, and enjoy more opportunities of informing themselves right in those points.
Sharp, vol iii. Ser. 16.

From the (not long since mentioned) frequent repetitions to be met with in the Scripture, and from the unusual method, wherein the author of it has thought fit, that the divine truths and precepts should be extant there, divers have been pleased to take occasion to criminate the Bible, as if, its bulk considered, it were but a barren book.
Boyle. Works, vol ii p. 283.

The prophet Nathan scrupled not to deceive David, that he might reclaim him, and surprise him into a confession of the criminousness of his fault.—Id. Ib. vol. ii. p 334.

A crime or misdemesnor, is an act committed or omitted, in violation of a public law, either forbidding or commanding it.—Blackstone. Commentaries, b. iv. c. 1.

The discussion and admeasurement of which (the general nature of crimes and their punishment,) forms in every country the code of criminal law.—Id. Ib.

When you have collected your audience, just at the moment when their minds are erect with expectation, let it be reported that a state criminal of high rank, is on the point of being executed in the adjoining square; in a moment the emptiness of the theatre would demonstrate the comparative weakness of the imitative arts, and proclaim the triumph of real sympathy.—Burke. Sublime and Beautiful, s. 15.

Lord Coke, the oracle of the English law, conforms to that general sense, where he says, that "those things which are of the highest criminality, may be of the least disgrace."
Id. Letter to the Sheriffs of Bristol.

It is no slight authority which shall persuade us (by receiving as proofs of loyalty the mistaken principles lightly taken up in these addresses) obliquely to criminate, with the heavy and ungrounded charge of disloyalty and disaffection, an uncorrupt, independent, and reforming parliament.
Id. Relative to the Speech from the Throne.

CRIMP, v. } Ger. Krumpen; Dut. Krimpen;
CRIMP, adj. } Sw. Krimpa; to cramp or crump,
CRI'MPLE. } (qv.); contrahere, arctare, coarctare.

Crimple or crumple is the diminutive. See CRUMP.

——— Now the fowler, warn'd
By these good omens, with swift early steps
Treads the crimp earth, ranging through fields and glades,
Offensive to the birds. J. Philips. Cider, b. ii.

He passed the cautery through them, and accordingly crimpled them up.—Wiseman. Surgery.

"To let your ladyship into a secret," said Mr. Barnet, "my brother Temple, although he is fond of fish, never will taste any thing that has been crimp'd alive; he insists upon it that all animals that are killed for our use, ought to be killed with the least pain possible, and for the same reason he will allow no eels at his table, but such as have not been skinn'd till they were dead.—Dr. Moore. Edward.

CRI'MSON, v. } Fr. Cramoisi; It. Cremisi;
CRI'MSON, n. } Sp. Carmesi; Dut. Karmesiin;
CRI'MSON, adj. } Arab. Kermez. Commonly called Carmesinum, because made from a worm which, in the Phœnician tongue, is called carmen, (Kilian.)

For God made neither purple nor crimson sheepe, nor taught to die with the iuyce of hearbs
Vives. Instruction of a Christian Woman, b. i. c. 9.

Than they passed furthe and came to the bridge of Parys, whiche was couered and richely besene, the countynge of grene and crimasyn full of starres, and the stretes hanged to our ladyes churche.
Berners. Froissart. Chronycle, vol ii. c. 157.

Pardon me, Julius! heere wast thou bay'd, braue hart;
Heere did'st thou fall, and heere thy hunter's stand,
Sign'd in thy spoyle, and crimson'd in thy Lethe.
Shakespeare. Julius Cæsar, Act iii. sc. 1.

With his rude touch my veil disorder'd then
My face discovering, my delicious cheek
Tincted with crimson, faded soon again,
With such a sweetness as made death seem meek.
Drayton. The Legend of Matilda the Fair.

And as a crimson poppie flower, surcharged with his seed
And vernall humoure falling thicke, declines his heavie brow;
So, of one side, his helmet's weight, his fainting head did bow. Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. viii.

——— Mean-while the moon
Full orbed, and breaking through the scattered clouds
Shows her broad visage in the crimson'd east.
Thomson. Autumn.

Let us go and let us fly,
Where our friends the conflict share,
Where they triumph, where they die.
Gray. The Fatal Sisters.

CRINGE, v. } Demisso corpore serviliter devenerari, (Lye;) who resorts to the Hebrew. Skinner says,—Perhaps from the Ger. Kriechen, to creep or crawl.
CRINGE, n. }
CRI'NGING, n. }

To cringe is formed from Ge or ce (c hard) cring-an, to twist, to bend. See To CRANK.

To bend or bow; to do or perform any act of servile submission or obedience; any fawning, flattering courtesy or compliance.

I went from England into France,
Nor yet to learn to cringe nor dance,
Nor yet to ride or fence.—Corbet. Journey into France.

Mir. Thou art not worth my anger, th'art a boy, a lump o'thy father's lightness, made of nothing but antick cloathes and cringes.—Beaum. & Fletch. Elder Brother, Act iii. sc. 3.

Hee is the now court-god; and well applyed
With sacrifice of knees, of crooks, and cringe.
B. Jonson. Sejanus, Act i.

A small matter it was which turn'd him [Jehoash] from following the ways of God, in which he had made so good a beginning, he was moved only by the flatteries, bowings, and cringings of his wicked courtiers to him.
Goodwin. Works, vol. iii. pt. i. p. 193.

The pope cringed (pulled downe his head to his shoulders after the Italian fashion, see Records, v. 3. p. 50) in the Italian way, but said, he had not time then to hear those papers.—Burnet. Hist. of the Reformation, an. 1531.

For my kneeling down at my entrance, to begin with prayer, and after to proceed with reverence, I did but my duty in that; let him scoffingly call it cringing, or ducking, or what he please.—State Trials. Abp. Laud, an. 1644.

Knowing how to mask concerted guile
With a false cringe or undermining smile;
His manners pure, from affectation free,
And prudence shines through clear simplicity.
Fenton. To Thomas Lambard, Esq.

You can be honest; but you cannot bow,
And cringe, beneath a supercilious brow:
You cannot fawn; your stubborn soul recoils
At baseness; and your blood too highly boils.
Philips. Epistle from Holland to a Friend in England.

——— She that asks
Her dear five hundred friends, contemns them all,
And hates their coming. They (what can they less?)
Make just reprisals: and with cringe and shrug,
And bow obsequious, hide their hate of her.
Cowper. Task, b. ii.

CRI'NITE, n. } Lat. Crinitus, crinis, a lock of hair, from the Gr. Κριν-ειν, cernere, to separate; from the custom of separating the hair into locks. See Vossius.
CRI'NET. }

Crinet, is used by Gascoigne for a lock of hair. See CAUDATE.

First for hir head, the heeres were not of gold
But of some other metall farre more fine,
Whereof eache crinet seemed to behold,
Like glistring wiers against the sunne that shine.
Gascoigne. Dan Bartholomew of Bathe

How comate, crinite, caudate, stars are formed.
Fairefax. Godfrey of Bovlogne, b. xiv. s. 44.

CRI'NKLE, n. } To wrench, wring, or
CRI'NKLING, adj. } wrinkle; to bend, to bow, to CRI'NKLING, n. } wind.

And for the house is crenceled to and fro,
And hath so queinte waies for to go,
For it is shapen as the mase is wrought,
Thereto haue I a remedy in my thought,
That by a clewe of twine, as he hath gon
The same way he may returne anon.
Chaucer. Legend of Ariadne.

Her face all bowsy
Comely crinckled
Wonderously wrynkled. Skelton. Elinour Rumming.

Her legs are two faint crinkling props, her feet
Already mouldring haste their grave to meet.
Beaumont. Psyche, c. 9. s. 30.

We come next of all vnto the Wiuer, than the which I read of no riuer in England that fetcheth more or halfe so many windlesses and crinklings, before it come to the sea.
Holinshed. Desc. of Britaine, c. 15.

Unless some sweetness at the bottom lie,
Who cares for all the crinkling of the pye?
King. Art of Cookery

It is the crinkles in this glass making objects appear double, and representing each individual as two distinct things, which produces that distinction urged by some people between human prescience and divine, as if one might be compatible with human liberty, though the other were repugnant.—Search. Light of Nature, pt. iii. c. 26.

CRI'PPLE, v. } Dut. Krapel, from Krepen,
CRI'PPLE, n. } serpere, to creep; qui, manibus pro pedibus utens, humi
CRI'PPLE, adj. } serpit, (creeps,) Skinner. Written Crepil and Creeple in old writers.

To cause to creep; and thus,—to lame; to injure or destroy the power of motion; to deprive of the use of the limbs.

It is full hard to halten vnespied
Before a crepil, for he can the crafte.
Chaucer. Troilus, b. iv.

As you see yourself so shamefully halt, that neuer lame cripple that lay impotēt by the walles in creping oute vnto a dole, halted half so sore.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 1125.

I counsaile thus that may thee best aduise,
For that myselfe did serue a cruell dame;
The blinde recurde can iudge of bleared eies,
The creple heaide, knowes how to heale the lame
Turbervile. To his Friend T.

——— Thou cold Sciatica
Cripple our senators, that their limbes may halt
As lamely as their manners.
Shakespeare. Timon of Athens, Act iv. sc. 1.

He who says that night is night,
That cripple folk walk not upright,
Believe him not, although he swear.
Drummond. The Character of an Anti-covenanter, &c.

The souls of women are so small,
That some believe they've none at all;
Or if they have, like cripples, still
They've but one faculty, the will.
Butler. Miscellaneous Thoughts.

That with their shoulders strove to squeeze,
And rather save a crippled piece
Of all their crush'd and broken members,
Than have them grillied on the embers.
Hudibras, pt. iii. c. 3.

"Epictetus, who lies here, was a slave and a cripple, poor as the beggar in the proverb, and the favourite of heaven."
Johnson. Ess. on Epitaphs

A merry, gay, jocose companion boon,
Round whom the noisy crowd incessant laugh,
As to the bath the crippled wretch is borne
West. Triumph of the Gout.

CRI'SIS, n. Fr. Crise; It. Crisi; Sp. Crisis; Lat. Crisis; Gr. Κρισις, from Κρι-ειν, to decide, to judge. Dies critici; i. e. dies judiciales, days for judgment, for decision. (See in v. CRITICK the quotations from Pliny.) And thus, crisis—

The point, the moment or time of decision, of determination.

I understand by your last kind lines that you were to be at court as to morrow; so as I hope by your next foot post to hear the crisis of that day.—Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p.574.

It is observed in all those actions or passages, which cause any great and notable change, either in the mind or life of man, that they do not constantly operate at the same rate of efficacy, but that there is a certain crisis, or particular season, which strangely provokes and draws forth the activity and force of every agent, raising it to effects much greater and higher than the common measure of its actings is observed to carry it to —South, vol vi. Ser. 7.

First, I observe, that crisises, properly so called, do very seldom happen in other than fevers, and the like acute diseases, where according to the common course of things, the malady is terminated, in no long time, either by recovery or death, or a change into some other disease.

Boyle. Works, vol. v. p. 211.

CRISP, v. CRISP, adj. CRISPA'TION. CRI'SPED. } Fr. Crespe; It. and Sp. Crespo; Lat. Crispus, which Tooke considers to be from the A. S. Cirpsian, crispare, torquere, to twist:—formerly written cirps.

To twist, to curl, to wind about or along.

To twist, (sc.) into a state of stiffness; into fixed curls; to curl; to cause to be stiff or unbending: and thus, consequentially, to be frangible; brittle.

Her heere that was owndie [waving] and crips
As burned gold it shone to see.

Our Lord hath made bald the heads of the daughters of Syon, and instead of the ornamēt they shall haue shame & for their crispe haire they shall haue baid pates.

Vives. Instruction of a Christian Woman, b. i. c. 9.

The sign of peace who first displays,
The olive wreath possesses;
The lover with the myrtle sprays
Adorns his crisped tresses.—Drayton, Nymphal 5.

So are those crisped snaikie golden locks
Which makes such wanton gambols with the winde.

Shakespeare. Merchant of Venice, Act iii. sc. 2.

But rather to tell how, if art could tell,
How from that saphire fount the crisped brooks,
Rouling on orient pearl and sands of gold
With mazie error under pendant shades
Ran nectar. Milton. Paradise Lost, b. iv.

If the cakes at tea eat short and crisp they were made by Olivia.—Goldsmith. Vicar of Wakefield, c. 16.

CRITERION. Gr. Κριτηριον, from Κρινειν, to discern, to decide, to judge.

That by or from which a decision or judgment is to be made.

Our knowledge therefore is real, only so far as there is a conformity between our ideas and the reality of things. But what shall be the criterion? How shall the mind, when it perceives nothing but its own ideas, know that they agree with things themselves?—Locke. Hum. Underst. b. iii. c. 4.

Their fortitude and philosophy I will not dispute, but humane, I am sure they are not; for it is the very criterion of true manhood to feel those impressions of sorrow which it endeavours to resist; and to admit, not to be above the want of consolation.—Melmoth. Pliny, b. viii. Let. 16.

CRI'TICK, adj. CRI'TICK, n. CRI'TICK, v. CRI'TICAL. CRI'TICALLY. CRI'TICISE, v. CRI'TICISER. CRI'TICISM. CRITI'QUE, n. } Gr. Κριτικος, from Κρινειν, to discern, to decide, to judge.

One who is able to discern, to distinguish, to decide, to judge.

To criticise,—to examine, investigate, or inquire into; to pass sentence, to give opinion upon, as a critick; i. e. as one able to discern, to distinguish, to decide, to judge.

Appe. Nay, if you begin to critic once, we shall never have done.—Brewer. Lingua, Act iv. sc 9.

But, some will say, criticks are a kind of tinkers; that make more faults then they mend ordinarily.

B. Jonson. Discoveries.

And therefore I am in good hope, that though the musick I have made be but dull and flat, and even downright plainsong, yeen your curious and critical ears shall discover no discord in it.—Chillingworth. Rel. of Prot. c. 6. p. 1.

Then bee the foure decretorie or criticall daies, that give the dome of olive trees, either to good or bad this is the southerly point of filthie, foule and glowmie weather, whereof wee have spoken before.

Holland. Plinie, b. xvii. c. 2.

Herein exact and critical trial should be made by publike enjoinment: whereby determination might be setled beyond debate.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. ii. c. 5.

And therefore whatever we want of either outward or inward accomplishments, secular or spiritual good successes, prosperities of kingdoms or soules, would we but look critically into ourselves, we should go near to find imputable to the want in us of one or both these ascending aspects.

Hammond. Works, vol iv. p. 498.

This I take to be the true and genuine meaning of this passage, upon which no charge of Pelagianisme can be fastened; nor needeth it any spinous criticisms for its explication.—Mede. Works, b. i. Dis. 4.

I thought at first he would have plaid the ignorant critique with every thing, along as he had gone.

B. Jonson. Cynthia's Revells.

In poets, as true genius is but rare,
True taste as seldom is the critic's share.

Pope. Essay on Criticism.

Like a confident dunce at school, that is highly pleased with mean performances of his own; but a true modest scholar, who knows better what he is to do, and understands the critical niceties of learning, is hardly satisfied with any thing that he does.—Stillingfleet, vol. iii. ser. 3.

These probationers are first appointed to preach practically on a text assigned them; next, critically upon another, the sense of which is controverted, and then a mixed sermon, of criticism on the text, and practical inferences from it is expected from them.—Burnet. Life, p. 8.

Nor shall I look upon it as any breach of charity to criticise the author, so long as I keep clear of the person.

Spectator, No. 262.

Others took upon them to be pert criticisers and saucy correctors of the original before them.

Blackwall. Sacred Classicks, vol. ii. p. 263.

The criticisms which I have hitherto published have been made with an intention rather to discover beauties and excellencies in the writers of my own time, than to publish any of their faults and imperfections —Spectator. No. 262.

Be silent always, when you doubt your sense,
And speak, though sure, with seeming diffidence:
Some positive, persisting fops we know,
Who, if once wrong, will needs be always so;
But you with pleasure, own your errors past,
And make each day a critique on the last.

Pope. Essay on Criticism.

We owe few of the rules of writing to the acuteness of criticks, who have generally no other merit than that, having read the works of great authors with attention, they have observed the arrangement of their matter, or the graces of their expression, and then expected honour and reverence for precepts which they never could have invented.—Rambler, No. 158.

Poets, and orators, and painters, and those who cultivate other branches of the liberal arts, have without this critical knowledge succeeded well in their several provinces and will succeed.—Burke. On the Sublime and Beautiful.

Our circumstances are indeed critical; but then they are the critical circumstances of a strong and mighty nation.

Id. On a late State of the Nation.

They soon after, with great joy, saw the snow fall in large flakes from the trees, a certain sign of an approaching thaw; they now examined more critically the state of their invalids.—Cook. Voyage, vol. i. b. i. c. 4.

Criticism, though dignified from the earliest ages by the labours of men eminent for knowledge and sagacity, and since the revival of polite literature the favourite study of European scholars, has not yet attained the certainty and stability of science.—Rambler, No. 158.

If I have been rather long upon this head, it is because I conceive this critique on the Hippolytus will let the reader, at once, into the true character of Seneca; which, he now sees, is that of a mere declamatory moralist.

Hurd. Notes on the Art of Poetry.

CROAK, v. CROAK, n. CRO'AKING, n. CRO'AKING, adj. } A. S. Cracettan, crocitare, to croke like a crow, (Somner.) Fr. Croasser, croaquer; It. Crocitare; Lat. Crocire, Gr. Κρωζ-ειν.

To croak like a frog,—Fr. Croasser; Lat. Coaxare; Gr. Κοαξ-ειν. All said to be from the sound. But see To CREAK.

As the raven's croak is thought to forbode ill luck, to croak is used to denote—

To forbode, to prognosticate, ill luck; discontentedly; in a spirit of discontent.

Thou donghill crow, that crockest against the raine,
Home to thy hole, brag not with Phœbe again.

Uncertaine Auctors. Against him that had slaundered, &c.

Ne let th' vnpleasant quyre of frogs still croking
Make vs to wishe their choking.
Let none of these their drery accents sing,
Ne let the woods them answer nor their eccho ring.

Spenser. Epithalamion.

Till flocks of ravens them with noise awake,
Over the army like a cloud that hung;
Which greater haste enforceth them to make,
When with their croaking all the country rung,
Which boded slaughter, as the most do say.

Drayton. Battle of Agincourt.

They [frogs] let down their nether lip somewhat under the water, that they gargle with their tongue levell to the water, which they received into their throate: and so while the tongue quivereth withall they make that croking above said.

Holland. Plinie, b. xi. c. 37.

Rebels were sainted, forsigners did reign,
Outlaws return'd, preferment did obtain,
With frogs and toads, and all their crooking train.

Dryden. Tarquin & Tulia.

Their understandings are but little instructed when all their whole time and pains is laid out to still the croaking of their own bellies, or the cries of their children.

Locke. On Humane Understanding, b. iv. c. 20.

From night to night she [Care] watches at his bed,
Now, as one mop'd, still brooding o'er his head,
Anon she starts, and borne on raven's wings,
Croaks forth aloud—" Sleep was not made for kings "

Churchill. Gotham, b. iii

The hoarse, deep, periodical croak of the corvorants serves as a base to the rest —Pennant. Zoology. Puffin Auk.

The notes of all birds of a superior size, being either screaming, croaking, or chattering, the pigeon kind excepted, whose slow plaintive continued monotone has something sweetly soothing in it.—Id. Ib. The Missel Thrush.

CROCK, n. CRO'CKERY, n. } A. S. Crocca; Dut. Kruycke; Ger. Krug. Of uncertain etymology. Perhaps so called from its brittleness or liability to crack.

A vessel made of clay, and dried by heat.

And when that dronken all was in the crooke,
To bedde went the doughter right anon,
To bedde goth Alein, and to bedde goth John.

Chaucer. The Reves Tale, v. 4154.

Strive not as doth a crock against a wall,
Deme first thyself, that demest others dede;
And truth shall thee deliver it is no drede.

Uncertaine Auctors. To reade a Virtuous and Honest Life.

Therefore the vulgar did about him flock,
And cluster thick vnto his leasings vaine;
Like foolish flies about an honey crock.

Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. v. c. 2

As she was hurrying him away, his spurs takes hold of her petticoat, his whip throws down a cabinet of china: He cries, what! are your crocks rotten?—Tatler, No. 37.

I then enquired for the person that belonged to the petticoat; and to my great surprise, was directed to a very beautiful young damsel, with so pretty a face and shape, that I bid her come out of the crowd, and seated her upon a little crock at my left hand.—Id. No. 116

As he began to twist and sprawl,
The loosen'd stones break from the wall;
Down drops the rake upon the spot,
And after him an earthen pot;
Reeling he rose, and gaz'd around,
And saw the crock lie on the ground.

Somervile. The Happy Disappointment

CROCODILE, n. Fr. Crocodile; It. and Sp. Crocodilo; Lat. Crocodilus; Gr. Κροκοδειλος, from Κροκος, and δειλος, quia κροκον δειλια, crocum metuit; because it fears or dislikes the crocus or saffron: whence the Egyptians place saffron before their beehives, to protect their honey from this animal. (See Vossius.) Pliny throws no light upon this etymology; and Herodotus says, the name of Crocodile was first imposed by the Ionians, from their resemblance to lizards, (so named by them,) which are produced in the hedges, (Euterpe, c. 69.) See the example from Fuller.

As cursed crocodile most cruelly can tole
With truthlesse teares unto his death the silly pitieng soule.—Vncert. Auctors. Louer dreadding to mone.

The river Nilus nourisheth the crocodile; a venomous creature, foure footed, as daungerous upon water as land. This beast alone, of all other that keepe the land, hath no use of a tongue. He only moveth the upper jaw or mandible, wherewith he biteth hard.—Holland. Plinie, b. viii. c. 25.

——— Ambiguous between sea and land
The river horse, the scaile crocodile.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. vii.

In a word, the soverain power of genuine saffron is plainly proved by the antipathy of the crocodiles thereunto, for the crocodile's tears are never true, save when he is forced (where saffron groweth, whence he hath the name of κροκο-δειλος, or the saffron-fearer,) knowing himself to be all poison, and it all antidote.—Fuller. Worthies. Essex.

The alligator is a creature so well known every where, that I should not describe it were it not to give an account of the difference between it and the crocodile; for they resemble each other so nearly in their shape and bulk, as also in their natures, that they are generally mistaken for the same species.—Dampier. Voyage, an. 1676.

At Arsinoe the crocodile was adored; because having no tongue it was made in hieroglyphic writing the symbol of the divinity, elsewhere it was had in horror, as being made in the same writing the symbol of Typhon.
Warburton. The Divine Legation, b. i. s. 4.

CRO'CUS. } Of uncertain origin. See the CRO'KERS. } example from Holinshed.

A certaine young gentleman, called Crocus, went to plaie at coits in the field with Mercurie, and being heedlesse of himselfe, Mercurie's coit happened by mishap to hit him on the head, whereby he receiued a wound that yer long killed him altogither, to the great discomfort of his friends. Finallie, in the place where he bled, saffron was after found to grow, wherevpon the people seeing the colour of the chiue as it stood, (although I doubt not but it grew there long before,) adiudged it to come of the blood of Crocus, and therefore they gaue it his name.—Holinshed. England, c. 8.

——— Under foot the violet,
Crocus, and hyacinth with rich inlay
Broider'd the ground, more colour'd then with stone,
Of costliest emblem. Milton. Paradise Lost, b. iv.

The crokers or saffron-men do vse an obseruation a little before the comming vp of the floure, and sometime in the taking vp at Midsummer-tide, by opening the heads to iudge of plentie and scarcitie of the commoditie to come.
Holinshed. England, c. 8.

CROFT, n. A. S. Croft; a little farm, a close or little field enclosed, (Somner,) Spelman (in v. Croftum,) thinks from the Gr. Κρυπτ-ειν, tegere, to cover, to protect; in which he is followed by other etymologists. Minshew says, a croft is a little close joyning to a house, that sometimes is used for a hempe-plot, sometime for corne, and sometime for pasture, as the owner listeth. It seemeth to come of the old English word Creaft, signifying handicraft; because such grounds are for the most part extraordinarily dressed and trimmed by the labour and skill of the owner.

For thei comen to my croft, my corn to defoule.
Piers Ploughman, p. 129.

Thre hundred they do adde, all issued out with one good will,
Such as Cerites house did keepe, or Mymon croftes did till.
Phaer. Virgill. Æneidos, b. x.

A croft we esteem some little plot of ground, and both the name and the thing are yet in ordinary knowledge.
Verstegan. Restitution of Decayed Intelligence, c. 9.

——— This have I learnt
Tending my flocks hard by i' th' hilly crofts,
That brow this bottom-glade. Milton. Comus.

And Leinster's crofts beneath the pheasant's brake,
Long lay unnoted. Dyer. The Fleece, b. ii.

CROISA'DE, or CRUSA'DE, v. & n. CROISA'DO, CRO'ISEZ. } Fr. Croisade; It. Crociata; Sp. Cruzada, from Lat. Crux, a cross. "An expedition of Christians assembled out of divers countreys (by preachings and the Pope's bulls,) against the Turks and other infidels; tearmed so, because every one of them, when he undertakes his journey, accepts of, and wears on his cassock, or coat-armour, the badge of the cross," (Cotgrave.) Applied generally to—

Any war, any attack, any hostility; carried on with religious zeal. Fabyan uses the verb to croysey;—to wear the badge, to serve under the banner of the Cross.

The Fryday folowynge the feast of Penthecost, in yt yere of xii. c. and xliii. and xxii. yere of the reygne of the sayd Lewys, he, with many of his lordes, departed from Parys vpon his iourney towarde the holy lande: In whiche was croysed also the Archebisshop of Bourges, &c. with many other noble men whiche were longe to reherse.—Fabyan, an. 1263.

And whan that Pope Innocent the Sixt, and the colledge of Rome, sawe how they were vexed by these cursed people, they were greatly abashed, and then ordeyned a croysey, agaynst these yuell Christen people, who dyde their payne to distroy Christendome, as other bandes had done before w'out tytell of any reason.—Berners. Froiss. Cron. c. 216.

This pope is decrepit, and the bell goeth for him. Take order, that when he is dead, there be chosen a pope of fresh years between fifty and three-score: and see that he take the name of Urban, because a pope of that name did first institute the croisado, and as with an holy trumpet, did stir up the voyage for the Holy Land.—Bacon. Of an Holy War.

The croisade was not appointed by Pope Urban alone, but by the council of Clermont, consisting of more than two hundred bishops assembled for all the west; and so persuaded were all persons of the will of God concurring in this enterprise, that it was made the shout for battle.
Jortin. On Ecclesiastical History.

After this narrative of the expeditions of the Latins to Palestine and Constantinople, I cannot dismiss the subject without revolving the general consequences on the countries that were the scene, and on the nations that were the actors, of the memorable crusades.—Gibbon. Roman Empire, c. 61.

The ecclesiastics took up the cross as well as others; but it should have been from a different motive, namely, to instruct the croisez, to comfort them, to administer the sacraments to them, and not to buy off their xxxx penances.
Jortin. On Ecclesiastical History.

The clergy, whose wealth and policy enabled them to take advantage of the necessity and weakness of the croisez, were generally the purchasers of both.
Burke. Abridgement of English History.

Reason her logic armour quit,
And proof to mild persuasion sit;
Religion with free thought dispense,
And cease crusading against sense.—Green. The Grotto.

Yet if crusaders like, their zeal be rage,
They hurt the cause in which their arms engage:
On heav'nly anvils forge the temper'd steel,
Which fools can brandish, and the wise may feel.
Whitehead. On Ridicule.

CRO'ISANT. Crescent; so written after the French by some of our early writers.

So often as she [the Moone] is seene westward after the sunne is gone downe, and shineth the forepart of the night onely, she is croisant, and in her first quarter.
Holland. Plinie, b. xviii. c. 33.

CRO'KED, a. Gower uses this word. See in v. CHAPLET. And see Skinner.

CRONE, n. CRO'NY. } Crone, croane, croen; a decrepit, crafty old woman, says Skinner. Verstegan derives from the A. S. Crone, a ewe. Others from Gr. Κρονος, Saturn, or κρονιος, lasting. But Dr. Jamieson leads us to the true etymology. Croyn, crone, crune, or croon, in Scotch, is a hollow, continued moan, (or rather groan;) the moan (or groan) of those who habitually utter heavy complaints under slight indisposition: it is also applied to the hollow murmuring sound with which old witches (i. e. the croners,) uttered their incantation; also, to the incantation itself; and further (without doubt) to the incantatrix herself. And thus it appears to be from the verb (Dut. Kreunan,) to groan, (by the common interchange of c and g.)

Cronies are those who groan or grumble over their grievances together.

This olde Soudanesse, this cursed crone,
Hath with hire frendes don this cursed dede.
Chaucer. The Man of Lawes Tale, v. 4952.

——— That croked croane, although she be my make?

Tusser. The Farmer's Daily Diet.

"But stormes" (thought Battus) "haue their steps,
Not long the crone can liue,
Or if my kindness length her life,
My kindness God forgive."—Warner. Albion's England.

In vain he sigh'd and oft with teare desir'd,
Some reasonable suit might be required,
But still the crone was constant to her note,
The more he spoke, the more she stretch'd her throat.
Dryden. The Wife of Bath's Tale.

The frugal crone, whom praying priests attend,
Still strives to save the hallow'd taper's end,
Collects her breath, as ebbing life retires,
For one puff more, and in that puff expires.
Pope. Moral Essays.

Two-fac'd Janus, God of time!
Be my Phœbus, while I rhyme;
To oblige your crony Swift,
Bring our dame a new year's gift.
Swift. To Janus on New-Year's Day.

CROOK, v. CROOK, n. CROO'KED, adj. CROO'KEDLY. CROO'KEDNESS. CROO'KEN, v. } Dut. Krook; Ger. Krumcke; Fr. Croc. The family of this word, says Wachter, is in the possession of the Swedes, with whom Krokia, is to curve, bow or bend,—krock, bowed; and krykia, a pastoral staff, and a staff for stooping old men, (i. e. a crutch.)

To bend or bow, to turn out of a straight line, to twist, thwart, warp or writhe out of the direct course. (Met.) crooked, is—

Perverse, obstinate, self-willed, bad-tempered, ill-natured.

No on crokyd kene thorne, kynde fygys were.
Piers Ploukman, p. 25.

Pleas'd to the last, he crops the flowery food,
And licks the hand just rais'd to shed his blood.
Pope. Essay on Man, Ep. 1.

The fountain, which from Hellcon proceeds,
That sacred stream, should never water weeds,
Nor make the crop of thorns and thistles grow,
Which envy or perverted nature sow.
Waller. Upon Roscommon's Translation of Horace.

The fruits of the earth are the gift of God, and we pray for them as such; but yet we plant, and we sow, and we plow, for all that; and the hands, which are sometimes lift up in prayer, must at other times be put to the plow, or the husbandman must expect no crop.—South, vol. vi. Ser. 10.

Though he cring'd to his deanship in very low strains,
To others he boasted of knocking out brains,
And slitting of noses, and cropping of ears,
While his own ass's rags were more fit for the shears.
Swift. The Lahoos Overthrow.

Shall fields be till'd with annual care,
And minds lie fallow ev'ry year!
O, since the crop depends on you,
Give them the culture which is due:
Hoe every weed, and dress the soil,
So harvest shall repay your toil.—Cotton. Pleasure, Vis. 2.

CRO'SIER, n. Barb. Lat. Crocia; Fr. Crosse; an episcopal staff; from croix, a cross, of which it has the image upon the top. It is applied by Holinshed to the cross-bearer; by Hackluyt, to certain stars called crossiers or cross-starres.

And conscience his crocer. Piers Ploughman, p. 81.

And thus this foolish lest, I put in dogrell rime,
Because a crosier staff is best for such a crooked time.
Gascoigne. Flowers.

And in 15 degrees wé did rear the crossiers, and we might haue reared them sooner if we had looked for them. They are not right a crosse in the moneth of November, by reason that the nights are short there. Neuerthelesse we had the sight of them the 29th day of the said moneth at night.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 15.

He did imbarre the primate from hauing his crosse borne before him within the prouince of Leinster, which was contrarie to the canon law, that admitteth the crosier to beare the crosse before his archbishop in another prouince.
Holinshed. Description of Irelland, an. 1311.

To gain by love, where rage and slaughter fail,
And make the crosier o'er the sword prevail.
Tickell. On the Prospect of Peace.

CROSS, v. } The noun, Fr. Croix; It. Croce; Sp. Cruz. To cross, (Sp. Cruzar; Fr. Croiser,) to sign or mark with a cross; to set cross-wise; to lay overthwart, or one orecross another: also to cut or divide in form of a cross, like X; also to cancel or cross in writing, (Cotgrave.)

All these commodities would grow by following this our discouery, without iniury done to any Christian prince, by crossing them in any of their vsed trades, whereby they might take any just occasion of offence.
Hackluyt. Voyages, vol. iii. p. 22.

And though the Phenicians and Carthaginians, the Tyrians and Sydonians, are much renowned in histories for great navigatours; yet it is thought by the learned, that those voyages they performed, was onely by coasting and not by crossing the ocean.—Hakewill. Apologie, p. 268.

And so with vain and superstitious crossing of himself [Everard Digby] betook him to his Latin prayers, mumbling to himself, refusing to have any, but the Romish Catholicks.
State Trials. The Gunpowder Plot, an. 1606.

But Joue's will euer all law ouercomes;
No other God can crosse or make it void.
Chapman. Homer. Odyssey, b. v.

Then farewell crossing loyes, and loyfull crosses,
Most bitter sweets, and yet most sugar'd sowers,
Most hurtfull gains, yet most commodious losses,
That made my yeares to flee away like howers;
And spent the spring-time of mine age in vaine,
Which now my summer must redeeme againe.
Sterling. Aurora, s. 10.

In whose memory, and as monuments of her vertue and his affection, King Edward caused Crosses with her statue to be erected in all chief places where her corpse in carrying to Westminster rested: as at Stamford, Dunstable, St. Alban's, Waltham, Cheapside, and lastly at the place called Charing Cross.—Baker. Edward I. an. 1306.

—— These crosse points
Of varying letters, and opposing Consuls,
Mingling his honours, and his punishments,
Paying now ill, now well, raising Sejanus
And then depressing him, (as now of late
In all reports we have it) cannot be
Emptie of practice; 'Tis Tiberius's art.
B. Jonson. Sejanus, Act iv.

We had little else left us, to have in a direct and open way recourse unto, but those exhortations and charges given to Elders in the Epistles of the Apostles, as lying apparently crosse to this way of presbyteral government, as thwarting the rule of Christ, and directions of the Apostles.
Goodwin. Works, vol. iv. pt. iii. p. 179.

And also by the law of king Ethelred, who about the thirtieth year of his reign, ordain'd, that every eight hides or plough-land through the whole kingdom, shall find a man with a crosslet and helmet to the naval expedition.
Spelman. Of Feuds and Tenures, c. 8.

It shall be crossly matched. the Gods themselves
Shall sow wild strife betwixt her lord and her.
Beaum. & Fletch. Philaster, Act ii. sc. 1.

Thus much that the word fornication is to be understood as the language of Christ understands it, for a constant alienation and disaffection of mind, or for the continual practice of disobedience and crossness from the duties of love and peace.—Milton. Tetrachordon.

To make a good, a wise, and a virtuous man, 'tis fit he should learn to cross his appetite, and deny his inclination to riches, finery, or pleasing his palate, &c. whenever his reason advises the contrary, and his duty requires it.
Locke. On Education, s. 52.

Every man carrying a sabre by his side, a short pole-axe before him, and a skrewed gun hanging at his back by a leather belt that went cross his shoulder.
Sir Wm. Temple to Sir J. Temple, May, 1666

The loxia or cross-bill, whose bill is thick and strong, with the tips crossing one another, with great readiness breaks open fir-cones, apples, and other fruit to come at their kernels, which are its food, as if the crossing of the bill was for this service.—Derham. Phys.-Theol. b. iv. c. 11.

But Russel was provoked by some letters and orders, that the Earl of Nottingham sent him from the Queen, which he thought were the effects of ignorance; and upon that he fell into a crossness of disposition.—Burnet. Own Time, an. 1692.

What improvements they have had in their passage (as it is said some liquors are meliorated by crossing the sea) I cannot tell.—Burke. On the French Revolution.

He [Lord Chatham] made an administration so checkered and speckled; he put together a piece of joinery, so crossly indented and whimsically dove-tailed.
Burke. Speech on American Taxation.

CROTCH, n. } CRO'TCHET, v. } CRO'TCHET, n. } A Crotchet, for a humour or extravagant fancy: from the Fr. Peindre à la crotesque or grotesque; to paint in a strange, ridiculous, rude, and inartificial manner. An elegant metaphor, Skinner adds, derived from the art of painting; for absurd fancies or ideas are very similar to absurd and foolish forms of things. It is more probably the diminutive of crotch: Fr. Crochet, croc, a hook, (see CROOK,) applied to—

Any short turn, sudden quirk.

Crotchet is applied by Dryden to the crooked props of a cottage; furcas subiere columnæ. See also the usage from Boyle's Works.

——— And bellyche ycoruen
With crotchetes on corneres. Piers Plouhman. Crede.

Drawing his breath as thick and short as can
The nimblest crotcheting musician.
Donne, Elegy 1. Jealousy.

Every device, every fancy of our own (especially in matters of religion) is straight of divine authority; and having resolved ourselves the children of God, every crotchet we fall upon must be necessarily Theopneust, and inspired, and others accused for irreligious, or singular, that will not as soon give homage to it.—Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 660.

But, before I leave the reader, I must give him this single advertisement, that the passages included within the parentheses or crochets, as the press styles them, that is, between any two such marks as these [ ] were inserted long since the writing of these essays.

CROUCH, v. } CROUCH, n. } CRO'UCHED, adj. } CRO'UCHING, adj. } CRO'UCHING, n. } Skinner says, from the Fr. Crochu, crooked; or Ger. Kauchen. It is probably by the common change of k into ch, merely—

To crook, to cower, to bend or bow down, to stoop.

Thanne comen cursed freres, and crouccheth ful lowe.
Piers Ploukman Crede.

I cannot crouch nor kneell to such a wrong:
To worship them like God on earth alone,
That are as wolves these sely lambes among.
Wyat. The Courtier's Life.

He will not creepe, nor crouch with fained face,
But walke vpright with comely stedfast pace,
And vnto all doth yeeld due curtesie.
Spenser. Mother Hubberd's Tale.

Did seem in great disdain the bold affront to take
That any petty hill upon the English side
Should dare, not (with a crouch) to veil unto their pride.
Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 12.

They knew not how to hide their slavish approach to God's behests by them not understood, nor worthily receiv'd, but by cloaking their servile crouching to all religious presentments, sometimes lawful, sometimes idolatrous, under the name of humility, and terming the py-bald frippery, and ostentation of ceremonies,—decency.—Milton. Reformation in England.

In her hand she (the Genius of Monarchy) held a sceptre like that which is borne by the British monarchs: a couple of tame lions lay crouching at her feet.—Tatler, No. 161.

We were received from the boat by some hundreds of the inhabitants, whose looks at least gave us welcome, though they were struck with such awe, that the first who approached us crouched so low that he almost crept upon his hands and knees.—Cook. Voyage, vol. i. b. i. c. 8.

The cause of treason never was confin'd
To deeds of open war, but still adopts
The stab of crouching murder.
Smollet. The Regicide, Act i. sc. 4.

CROUCH. To crouch, in Chaucer, is to sign with the cross, (Tyrwhitt.) Hence Crutched or Crossed Friars. See the example from Pennant.

And sayd his orisons, as is vsage,
And crouched him, and bade God shuld him blesse,
And made al siker ynow with holinesse.
Chaucer. The Marchantes Tale, v. 9582.

I crouche thee from elves, and from wightes.
Id. The Milleres Tale, v. 3479.

On the west side of this portion of the walls, stood the house of the Crutched or Crossed Friars, or Fratres sanctæ Crucis. The order was instituted, or at least reformed, about the year 1169, by Gerard, Prior of St. Mary de Morello, at Bologna.—Pennant. London, p. 347.

CROUP, n. Croupe, crouper or crupper. "Fr. Croupe, the top or knop of a bill; also the rump or crupper piece," (Cotgrave.) See CROP.

This carter thakketh his hors upon the croupe.
Chaucer. The Freres Tale, v. 7141.

A male tweifold on his croper lay,
It seemed that he caried litel array,
Al light for sommer rode this worthy man.
Id. The Chanones Yemannes Prologue, v. 16,034.

Him at the first encounter downe he smote,
And ouer bore beyond his crouper quight,
And after him another knight, that hote
Sir Brisnor, so sore, that none him life behote.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. iv. c. 4.

But now it brake and both gaue strokes so sound,
As made both horses cruppers kisse the ground.
Harrington. Orlando, b. xlvi. s. 100.

Elder Lo. Thou hast but one, and that's in thy left crupper, that makes thee hobble so.
Beaum. & Fletch. The Scornful Lady, Act iv. sc. 1.

But Ralpho (who had now begun
T' adventure resurrection,
From heavy squelch, and had got up
Upon his legs with sprained crup)—Hudibras, pt. i. c. 1.

CROUSE. Dr. Jamieson says, is brisk, lively, bold, apparently brave. He considers the word to have descended from Dut. Krocs; Ger. Kraus; Sw. G. Krus, krusig, signifying—Crisp, curled, frizzled. The primary allusion, he adds, seems to be to a cock, who is said to be crouse, when he bristles up his feathers, so as to make them appear as if curled. The A. S. Ge-hreos-an, irruere, to rush on, seems to present a more simple etymology by the common process of corruption—Ge- or ce-reose, creos, crose, or crouse.

And now of late Duke Humphry's old allies,
Which banish'd Elenor's base accomplices,
Attending their revenge, grow wond'rous crouse,
And threaten death and vengeance to our house.
Drayton. England's Heroical Epistles.

CROW, v. } CROW, n. } CRO'WING, n. } A. S. Crawan; Ger. Krachen. Galli more cantare, and this, parum detorto sensu, from the noun—in A. S. Crawe; Dut. Kraye; Ger. Krae, a crow, (Skinner.) All formed from the sound.

The noun is applied to the sound, and to the bird.

To crow, is to utter the sound; to make the noise, (&c.) of a cock, in triumph or defiance: and thus, consequentially—

To triumph over, to vaunt, to brag or boast over, to insult.

Crowsfeet is applied to the wrinkles of age between the cheek-bone and the eyes.

Vor he vel of is palefrey, & bree is fot bi eas.
So suart so enl crowe amorwe is fot was.
R. Gloucester, p. 490.

Ihesus seide to hym treuli I seyde to thee, for in this nyght bifore the cok crowe thries thou shalt denie me.
Wiclif. Matthew, c. 26.

Jesus sayde vnto hym: verelye I saye vnto thee, that this same night before the cocke crowe, thou shalt denye me thrise.—Bible, 1551. Ib.

As blake he lay as any cole or crowe,
So was the blood yronnen in his face.
Chaucer. The Knightes Tale, v. 2669.

The king's foole is wont to cry loud
Whã yt he thinketh a woman bereth her hie
So long mote ye liue, and all proud
Til crowes-fete grow vnder your eie
And send you then a mirrour in to prie.
Chaucer. Troilus, b. ii.

There is no cocke to crowe daie.—Gower. Con. A b. iv.

There were deuised certeine instrumentes wherewyth they myght pull downe the workes yt their enemyes made, called Harpagons, and also crowes of iron called Corvi.
Brende. Quintus Curtius, fol. 84.

If one of them happen to be conqueror, presently upon victorie hee croweth, and himselfe soundeth the triumph. Hee that is beaten, makes no words, nor croweth at all, but hideth his head in silence.—Holland. Plinie, b. x. c. 21.

I saw myselfe a crow belonging to a certaine knight of Rome, who brought him out of the realme of Grenado in Spayne, which was a very strange and admirable bird, not onely for the exceeding black colour of his feathers, but also for that he could pronounce and expresse so perfectly many words and sentences together, and learned still new lessons every day more than other.—Id. Ib. b. x. c. 43.

This good champion [St. Peter] of our Saviour, as a lyon that is reported to be daunted with the crowing of a cock, is stricken out of countenance and quite amazed with the voyce of a silly damsel.—Hales. Rem. Ser. St. Peter's Fall.

We will be with you ere the crowing cock
Salutes the light, and struts before his feather'd flock.
Dryden. The Epithalamium of Helen & Menelaus.

In the tragedy of Hamlet, where the ghost vanishes upon the cock's crowing, he takes occasion to mention its crowing all hours of the night about Christmas time, and to insinuate a kind of religious veneration for that season.
Tatler, No. 111.

Shrill crows the cock, the dogs give dismal yell;
And with the whirlwind's roar full comes the swell.
Mickle. Almada Hill.

CROWD, v. } CROWD, n. } CRO'WDING, n. } "A. S. Cruth; turba confertissima. A crowd, a prease or throng of people," (Somner.) Dut. Kruyden, to thrust

To thrust or press together, to flock or swarm together.

Croud, in the second quotation from Chaucer, is explained by Mr. Tyrwhitt,—to shove together. But Skinner translates the line;—qui diurno sono perpetuo Citharam pulsas. See CROWD, following.

A crowd, is a collection, a many of persons, close or pressed together. See CREW.

But in the same ship as he hire fond,
Hire and hire yonge sone, and all hire gere
He shulde put, and croude hire fro the lond
And charge hire, that she never eft come there.
Chaucer. The Man of Lawes Tale, v. 5221.

O firste moving cruel firmament,
With thy diurnal swegh that croudest ay,
And hurtlest all from est til occident,
That naturally wold hold another way;
Thy crouding set the heven in swiche array
At the beginning of this fierce viage,
That cruel Mars hath slain this marriage.—Id. Ib. v. 4716.

Who will, and dare reche forthe his hande,
and man the throughe the croude.
Drant. Horace. Epist. to Numitius.

There sees his crowded wharfs, and people-pest'red shores,
His bosom over-spread with shoals of labouring oars.
Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 17.

As a wave follows a wave, we shall find instances of folly croud in upon us.—Bp. Taylor. On Repentance, c. 10. s. 7.

So in Judæa, where a crowd of people would have been very troublesome in the heat of the day; we are told, That they brought their sick to Jesus to be healed, when the sun was set.—Grew. Cosmo Sacra, b. v. c. 2.

They also pass'd a declaration against the crowding of soldiers and others at the doors of both houses.
Whitelock. Memorials, an. 1647.

What is a man's whole life but the inconsiderable measure of a span? and yet the vast business of eternity is crowded into this poor compass.—South, vol. vii. Ser. 15.

But he did rise after three days, according to his prediction, and conversed upon earth with his followers for forty days together, showing himself not only to a few particular disciples, but to great crowds of them, five hundred at a time.—Sharp, vol. i. Ser. 6.

It would not have entered into their thoughts to have crowded together so many allusions to time and place, and to other little occurrences, which nothing besides the presence of the objects could suggest.
Jortin. On the Christian Religion, Dis. 6.

I come from empty noise, and tasteless pomp,
From crowds that hide a monarch from himself,
To prove the sweets of privacy and friendship,
And dwell upon the beauties of Irene.
Johnson. Irene, Act i. sc. 4.

CROWD, v. } Spelman says—Crotta. Fidicula Britannica. Cambris hodie a croud. Numquid a fiddle Hispan. Cuerda vel Græc. Κροταλίζω, strepo, plaudo. Skinner prefers the A. S. Cruth, a crowd or multitude, (q.d.) a crowd of fiddlers. See CROWD, ante, the second example from Chaucer.

CROWD, n.
CRO'WDER.

But his eldre son was in the feeld, and when he cam, and neighede to the hous he herde a symfonye and a croude.
Wiclif. Luke, c. 15.

Gnoth. Fiddlers, crowd on, crowd on; let no man lay a block in your way. Crowd on, I say.

That keep their consciences in cases
As fiddlers do their crowds and bases.—Hudibras, pt. ii. c. 2.

I never heard (says the accomplished Sir Philip Sidney) the old song of Percy and Douglas, that I found not my heart moved more than with a trumpet: and yet is it but sung by some blind crowder, with no rougher voice than rude style: which being so evill apparalled in the dust and cobweb of that uncivil age, what would it worke trimmed in the glorious eloquence of Pindare.
Ritson. Historical Essay on National Song.

CRO'WNER.
CRO'WNET.
CRO'WNLESS.

Dut. Kroone; Ger. Kron; Fr. Couronne; It. and Sp. Corona; Lat. Corona. A crown; in various old authors written corone, or, as in R. Brunne, infra, coroun. (See CORONAL.) Applied as well to—

That which is placed upon or surrounds the head, as to the head itself; the top of the head, the top or summit of any thing.

As crown is a mark, sign or badge of rank and dignity, it is used (met.) for—

Dignity, honour, glory, ornament, perfection, completion, consummation.

To crown,—to put on, or cover with, a crown; (sc.) in token of honour or dignity; and thus, consequentially, to honour, to dignify, to adorn, to bestow a prize or reward; to accomplish, to perfect, to complete.

Crownet,—see CORONET.

With air that gilds the water as it glides,
Crownets of pearl about his naked arms
And in his sportful hands an olive-tree,
Shall bathe him in a spring.
Marlow. Edw. II. Act i. sc. 1.

Secondly, our popish parliaments, peirs and prelates, have oft translated the crown from the right heirs, and setled it on others, who had no lawful right or title to it, electing and acknowledging them for their onely soveraigne lords, in which actions the popish prelates and clergy were commonly the ringleaders: witnesse their electing and crowning of Edward who was illegitimate, and putting by Etheruld the right heire after Edgar's decease, Anno 975.
Prynne. Treachery and Disloyalty of Papists, pt. i. p. 9.

Our excellent Edgar for increase of his benefits towards the Isle, join'd with preservation of his crown-duties, converted the tribute of the Welch into three hundred wolves a yeare.—Selden. Illust. of Drayton. Poly-Olbion, s. 9.

The king, well perceiuing, how vnable he should be eyther to recouer those his trans marine dominions, or almost to maintaine his owne royall estate at home, if such, as by the vnrulynes of former times hauing gotten possession of crown-lands, might still with-hold them, resolued to resume them.—Speed. Hen. III. b. ix. c. 9. s. 16. an. 1224.

To whom, from her, the crowne-right of Lancastrians did accrewe.
Warner. Albion's England, b. vii. c. 34.

Whom God has placed upon the throne, shall any human power presume to drag to the bar? or shall royal heads be crowned and annoynted only to prepare them to be sacrificed upon a scaffold?—South, vol. iii. Ser. 12.

From hence he does that antique pile behold,
Where royal heads receive the sacred gold:
It gives them crowns, and does their ashes keep,
There made like Gods, like mortals there they sleep.
Waller. On St. James's Park.

An ounce of silver, whether in pence, groats, or crown pieces, stivers, or ducatoons, or in bullion, is and always eternally will be of equal value to any other ounce of silver, under what stamp or denomination soever.

CRU'CIBLE, s. Bar. Lat. Crucibulum; It. Crosolo; "Fr. Croiset; a cruit, crucible or little pot, such as goldsmiths melt their gold in," (Cotgrave.) So called from being made in the shape of a cross, or from having a cross impressed upon it. See Crucibulum, in Du Cange. Chaucer uses Crosslet, (qv.) and see the quotation from Golden Boke.

The emperour had bore before hym, a brennynge brande: The consuille an axe of armes, the priestis haue in maner of a coyfe; the senatours a tongue in maner of a cruesible on their armes.—Golden Boke, c. 2.

So it is in the chrystal powdered, and so it is also before; for if it be made hot in a crusible, and presently projected upon water, it will grow dim.—Brown. Vulg. Err. b. ii. c. 1.

Some that deal much in the fusion of metals inform me, that the melting of a great part of a crucible into glass is no great wonder in their furnaces.—Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 400.

Then must thy gates fly open, and reveal
The mines that lay long forming under ground,
In their dark cells immur'd, but now full ripe
And pure as silver from the crucible,
That twice has stood the torture of the fire
And inquisition of the forge. Blair. Grave.

But whanne the bisshopis and mynystris hadden seien hym, thei crieden and seiden, crucifie, crucifie him. Pilat seith to hem, take ghe hym and crucifie ghe, for I fynde no cause in him.—Wiclif. Jon, c. 19.

When the hye preestes and ministers saw him, they cryed sayinge: crucifye him, crucifye him. Pilat sayd vnto thẽ, take ye hym and crucifye hym: for I find no cause in him.
Bible, 1551. Ib.

Thou must be meke and patient, and let euery mã goe ouer thee, and tread thee vnder foote and do thee wrong: and yet loue them, and pray for them, as Christ did for his crucifiers.—Tyndall. Workes, p. 210.

Howe be it, we nede not much to marualy though Tindall, and Luther, and frere Huskin, and theyr felowes, sette litle by the signe of the crosse made by a man's hande in ye ayre, sith we see that they sette so little by an ymage of the crucifixe, and also by Chrystes holy cross itselfe whereof Luther wryteth that if he had all the pieces, he would cast them all there as neuer sũne should shyne vpon them.
Sir T. More. Workes, p. 398.

Other prayers he can allow for the world, the veriest incarnate devils in it, the very crucifiers,—Father, forgive them: but this prayer for perseverance, for keeping, is only for the believers there.—Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 530.

Then to her wofull seruants did
She passe a kind adew;
And kissing oft her crucifix,
Vnto the block she drew [Mary of Scotland]
Warner. Albion's England, b. x. c. 56.

For to hang a man, as in our northern countries is meant and done; is to hang him, sub ligno, and not super ligno, whereas the Hebrew expresseth it to be done, super ligno, that is, by crucifixion.—Grew. Cosmo. Sacra, b. iv. c. 8.

By these, I say, and many other arguments, 'tis plain that the Gentiles had their part and guilt in the crucifying of Christ, and so by slaying the Son, as it is in the parable, provoked and deserved the implacable revenge of the Father.
Hammond. Works, vol. iv. p. 647.

The crucigerous ensigne carried this figure, not transversely or rectangularly intersected, but in a decussation, after the form of an Andrian or Burgundian cross which answereth this description. Whereby the way we shall decline the old theme, so traced by antiquity of crosses and crucifixion.—Brown. Cyrus' Garden, c. 1.

What person of sobriety and recollection would not crucify his sin rather than damn his soul.—South, vol. viii. Ser. 6.

The sight of Christ in glory, with his saints, will, in an inexpressible manner, torment the crucifiers of the one and the persecutors of the others: as it will shew them the hopes and wishes of their adversaries all granted to the full, and all their own "desires" and designs for ever at an end.
Bp. Horne. Commentary on Ps. 112.

The Earl of Kent observing that in her devotions she made frequent use of the crucifix, could not forbear reproving her for her attachment to the popish trumpery as he termed it.—Hume. Hist. of England. Elizabeth, an. 1587.

Now tardier fruits of crude kind are lost,
But tann'd with fire or mellow'd by the frost.

Dryden. Ovid. Met. b. xv.

We may say, wisdom and power in God are absolutely necessary, because God himself is absolutely necessary: but we cannot crudely say, the curing in men their aversion to the true religion, is absolutely necessary, because it is not absolutely necessary that man should be saved.

Locke. A Third Letter of Toleration.

No architect took greater care than he [Vanburgh] that his work should not appear crude and hard: that is, that it did not abruptly start out of the ground without expectation or preparation.—Sir Joshua Reynolds, Dis. 13.

The strong built pedant who both night and day
Feeds on the coarsest fare the schools bestow,
And crudely fattens at gross Burtman's stall;
O'erwhelm'd with phlegm lies in a dropsy drown'd,
Or sinks in lethargy before his time

Armstrong. The Art of Preserving Health, b. iv.

Dryden. Absalom & Achitophel.

Full in the entrance of the dreadfull doors,
Old age half vanish'd to a ghost deplores:
Propp'd on his crutch, he drags with many a groan
The load of life, yet dreads to lay it down.
Broome. On Death.

Halting on crutches of unequal size,
One leg by truth supported, one by lies;
They sidle to the goal with awkward pace,
Secure of nothing—but to lose the race.
Cowper. Progress of Errour.
